Special from Monitor Bureau
WASHINGTON, June 17.—Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel for the Anti-Saloon League, was put on the witness stand of the Senate campaign fund investigating committee by James A. Reed (D.), Senator from Missouri, chairman of the group and leader of the wets in Congress.

In taking the stand Mr. Wheeler declared he had first received notification of his summons from the morning papers a few hours before his appearance before the committee. Mr. Reed was the sole interrogator of the witness throughout the session that opened Mr. Wheeler's examination. Although the subpoena was issued in connection with the scrutiny of the Pennsylvania primaries that the committee has been making, Mr. Reed's questioning dealt entirely with the details of Mr. Wheeler's connections with the league, its officers, its method of organization and operation, its finances and its expenditures.

Where the witness could not give exact figures or definite information, he was directed to prepare the information and submit it later. It was immediately evident from Mr. Reed's queries that he purposed going exhaustively into the affairs of the Anti-Saloon League and Mr. Wheeler's work.

"What is your present work?"

"General counsel of the Anti-Saloon League."

"What is your salary?"

"Six hundred and sixty-six dollars a month."

"What salary did you start with for the league?"

"One hundred dollars a month."

Questions on Early Work

Mr. Reed questioned Mr. Wheeler extensively about his habits throughout his life and how he became connected with the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. Wheeler informed him that he became active in league work in 1894 and was paid $100 a month, which was supposed to be "a salary."

Taking up the years separately since 1894, Mr. Reed wanted to know Mr. Wheeler's salary, the amount he received and his expenditures. When the witness attempted to explain his uncertainty about some of the figures, the chairman advised him to "only answer the question."

"I'm trying to," Mr. Wheeler said. "If the subpoena had given me an idea of what you wanted I would have refreshed my memory on the matter. There is no secret about these things."

"Then whatever you have today, you made from this prohibition work?" Mr. Reed asked.

"Yes."

"Never tried any lawsuits? Never earned any outside fees?"

"No. I gave my whole time and effort to this work."

"Have you appeared in court in defense of people accused of violating the law?"

"No. But we have urged local officials to action in cases where we thought the individual was 'framed.'"

"What cases?"

Baltimore Case

"The case of a young man near Baltimore who went with federal officers to point out some stills and was waylaid afterward and attacked. When they found they had not destroyed him they filed charges of assault against him."

Mr. Wheeler related another instance where he advised league people in Kansas City to refrain from interfering in a case where a prohibition agent was charged with taking a bribe.

"Mrs. Willibrand denounced the action of the people, didn't she?" Mr. Reed said.

"Yes. And so did we. As a matter of fact, the league had nothing to do with starting the protest for a fair trial. It was the local church people and the W. C. T. U. We have a general rule to help officers, where the facts show they are innocent and are being framed by the liquor outlaw."

"You make up your minds and then interfere with the orderly processes of the law?"

"Just the opposite. We attempt to aid the law. Where we are convinced the man is guilty we aid law officials to convict him."

"But you pass on the facts. You make up your minds?"

"No. We submit only the facts. Have you ever furnished money for the defense?"

"No. We only present the facts in the case as we find them."

Mr. Reed directed the witness to bring league records "in all these cases you sought to interfere in."

"We don't call it interfering," Mr. Wheeler protested. "We present only the facts."

Mr. Reed carefully noted the names of the league's officers and by his questions indicated that he would call them for examination.

Light Turned on Pittsburgh

After obtaining details of the operation of the Vire political organization in Philadelphia the committee turned to scrutinize the activities of Pittsburgh political leaders.

Newspapermen and county and city officials were put on the stand. All witnesses insisted, several with exception.

Oil Discharge Ban
on Coasts Demanded

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON, June 17.—ESTABLISHMENT of 50 to 150 mile limits from the coasts of maritime nations, within which discharge of oil or mixtures constituting a nuisance would be prohibited, was recommended at the final session of the preliminary international conference on oil pollution of navigable waters.

The conference was attended by representatives of the United States, Belgium, England, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Norway, Spain and Sweden.

The conference recommended that each government require vessels flying its flag to refrain from discharging oil near the shores of other countries.

BRIAND TRIES
TENTH CABINETOnly Strong Government,
It Is Said, Can Restore
French FinanceBy SISLEY HUDDLESTON
By Special Cable

PARIS, June 17.—Poincaré-Herriot-Briand—such was the basis of the ministerial combination favored by President Doumergue, and Aristide Briand, in accepting the task of forming a tenth cabinet, agreed to appeal to the former Premier, who was vanquished two years ago at the polls, and to the latter Premier, who fell because he practiced inflation. Today M. Briand asked the two men to stand with him in a grand government to save the franc.

M. Poincaré represents the old Bloc National and M. Herriot the Bloc des Gauches. It is well to recall that M. Poincaré was beaten not because he was in active opposition to the Ruhr policy but because, on the eve of the elections, he boldly increased taxation. This produced discontent of which the Radicals availed themselves. Yet everybody now admits that M. Poincaré, in this respect, was right, and by his courage steered the franc at that time.

Radicals Fix Conditions

It is believed that the presence of M. Poincaré in the cabinet would, however much one disliked his foreign policy, have a good effect on French finances. Naturally, however, M. Poincaré imposes conditions which are hard to reconcile with radical conditions. Indeed M. Herriot, who is prepared to form a cabinet of his own, is bound to take heed of the resolution passed by the Radicals this morning and the general tone of the radical press.

In substance, the cabinet must enter a cabinet with M. Poincaré. The Radicals discussed the situation and in a motion said they were prepared in the grave circumstances to assume responsibility for the cabinet, but they refused to enter a cabinet with M. Poincaré.

The refusal of M. Herriot means of a republican country, all political attempts under cover of unity to restore power to a minority condemned by universal suffrage. They were ready to sustain a democratic government with a few days ago closing exercises were held and the Rev. Dr. Daniel L. Marsh, president of Boston University, addressed those who had completed the year's course.

State Certificates Won

Certificates were awarded by the committee on education of the Elevated to 536 employees while the University Extension Division of the Massachusetts Department of Education awarded 212 certificates for courses completed under its auspices.

The courses followed by the road's employees covered the following subjects: Foreman training, advanced electrical course, inter-departmental accounts, investing savings, transportation problems as a whole, selling service, first aid, current events, business English, time-table construction, safety measures, automobile maintenance, public utility economics, parliamentary law, correspondence and reports and public speaking.

In addition to those who received certificates at the closing exercises at least 300 other employees of the road attended some of the courses at the Sullivan Square Terminal Elevated school, but not enough to have their work officially recognized.

Conferences Largely Attended

During the preceding year more than 1000 employees followed courses under what was termed the "Group Conference Plan." These series of conferences were highly successful, Mr. Dana said, and they ended with separate closing exercises largely in the nature of an entertainment.

In the first two years of the educational work, Mr. Dana explained, the courses were conducted exclusively by the Massachusetts Department of Education and covered the subjects of public utility economics and electrical theory and practice. The courses, he said, provided an excellent start for the educational work and the railway has co-operated with the department ever since.

The educational committee for the next year, Mr. Dana announced as follows: J. W. Allen, chairman, electrical engineer; E. L. Lockman, engineer; Irving Pratt, cashier; John F. Kelley, clerk; Joseph Patten, foreman; David F. Lee, clerk; J. R. Cashman, clerk; Francis L. Sennott, inspector, and Bemis Gleason, attorney.

One-half hour's intensive reading on electrical application, transportation, automotive maintenance and other subjects directly connected with their work which are to be announced later is the outstanding feature of the program for the fifth year of educational work which the Boston Elevated Railway is planning for its employees.

The educational committee of the road will decide on the actual courses to be read later. Edward Dana, general manager of the railway, made this announcement today saying that he was desirous of arranging a plan whereby the employees who should pass the most creditable examination upon the result of his course of reading would be sent to some technical institute or university for a year.

The fourth year of the educational work which the Boston Elevated Railway has conducted for its employees, Mr. Dana considered to be the best and most encouraging of all, both in interest and attendance. At its termination a few days ago closing exercises were held and the Rev. Dr. Daniel L. Marsh, president of Boston University, addressed those who had completed the year's course.

Sesquicentennial of Navy
Is Celebrated at MarbleheadMassachusetts Town Which Furnished First Craft
Commissioned by Washington for Service Holds
Exercises at Which Secretary of Navy Speaks

MARBLEHEAD, Mass., June 17 (Special).—Before a great gathering that taxed the capacity of Abbott Hall, Curtis D. Wilbur, Secretary of Navy, today gave official recognition to Marblehead's claim of being the cradle of the American Navy when he said at the outset of his address at the town's official sesquicentennial observance, that "this celebration in this historic town bids us take note of the fact that George Washington, in September, 1775, established the American Navy by a part of his fighting forces by commissioning Captain Nicholas Broughton of Marblehead who sailed in the Hannah three days later, Sept. 5, 1775, and the following day brought in a prize."

Impressiveness was lent to the occasion by the detachments of sailors and marines who were present in full dress uniform. There were 33 midshipmen from the three battleships anchored in the harbor. They were in command of Lieut. L. A. Mason. There were 14 members of the Grand Army of the Republic led by Samuel Snow 24; 50 men from the American Legion under Percy L. Martin and 25 men from the Tenth Division under Lieut. Ernest Doane.

The invocation was read by Chaplain Albert R. Parker and the "Bells of the Republic" was sung by Marie Sundelius of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

John G. Stevens, chairman of the board of selectmen, made the welcoming address. He referred to the schooner Hannah, commissioned by Gen. George Washington, as "the solitary challenger to the imperial power of Great Britain upon the seas."

Lieut.-Gov. Frank G. Allen spoke as the representative of the State, Governor Fuller being unable to be present.

Judge Charles Thornton Davis, chairman of the Citizens Celebration Committee, said that the "fishermen" of Marblehead who manned the first vessel of the navy were representatives of the best of the nation's citizenry at the time. In conclusion and as he introduced Secretary Wilbur, Judge Stevens presented him a bronze plaque bearing in bas-relief the model of the Schooner Hannah.

On it were inscribed these words: "The first American warship regularly commissioned by authority derived from the United Colonies of North America, commissioned by Gen. George Washington, commanding the fleet of the United States, and as he introduced Secretary Wilbur, Judge Stevens presented him a bronze plaque bearing in bas-relief the model of the Schooner Hannah.

The narrow, crooked streets of Marblehead were decorated for the occasion, the Nation's flag fluttering from every vantage spot, while an abundance of hunting was employed upon all the public and many of the private buildings.

Secretary Wilbur
Secretary Wilbur, in his address, reviewed the history of the American Navy from the day in September, 1775, when Captain Broughton sailed in the Hannah, to the present time. "By February, 1776," he said, "the duties of administering the new American Navy had become so arduous that Washington's private secretary, Col. Joseph Reed, was granted additional pay amounting to $34 per month by Congress on account of the extraordinary services attending the office by reason of the General's direction of the Navy Department.

"Thus it would not seem incorrect to say that the first Secretary of the Navy, recognized and paid by Congress, was Col. Joseph Reed. From those humble beginnings a century and a half ago the American Navy of today, exemplified by the splendid ships now floating in your harbor, has developed."

Secretary Wilbur referred to the Constitution, now at the Charlestown Navy Yard, Boston, and the Constellation, regularly assigned to Newport, but temporarily stationed at the Philadelphia Navy Yard as a part of the Sesquicentennial Exposition. The victories of the Constitution, the United States and other naval vessels over British ships of equal or superior power in the War of 1812, he said, "re-established our self-respect and gave us a new and better standing with the world."

Glorious History
"I will not undertake to recount the glorious history of the American Navy," he continued, "nor recount the exploits of John Paul Jones, Stephen Decatur, Isaac Hull, and others for land, water and air service alike."

BRITAIN NOT TO HAVE
MINISTER OF DEFENSE
By Cable from Monitor Bureau
LONDON, June 17.—The British Government has taken a decision tending against further consolidation of British armaments. This decision refuses to sanction the appointment of a minister of defense to co-ordinate the existing army, navy and air forces. This appointment, which had been strongly pressed upon the Government as making for increased efficiency for war (Winston Churchill being generally named for the new post) has now been definitely rejected.

In indicating this decision in the House of Lords the Earl of Balfour said that a new warrant would be issued instead defining the chiefs of staff's duties. These officers would meet regularly and draw up common proposals for the consideration by the existing Imperial Defense Committee. An Imperial defense college is also to be instituted to train officers for land, water and air service alike.

ICE cream soda—all flavors—is the latest American comfort to be provided for railroad travelers on a new model Pullman observation car made for the Denver Special, a new train of the Burlington Route making its first trip west from here. The national beverage, with other soft drinks on ice, is served from a small soda fountain room adjoining the observation lounge as the train speeds vacationists to the mountains. The new coach departs from conventions of railroad decoration with paneled walls painted in Pompeian designs and colors. Lighting is from the side, and upholstery is in soft tones of green morocco leather. Nooks with benches are provided for those who would sit at tables.

PRINCE CALLS

Adopted Lands

By a Staff Correspondent

WORCESTER, Mass., June 17.—In the preservation of continued amity between the United States and his country may Swedish residents in America find their chief service to both nations, Crown Prince Gustavus Adolphus told thousands of this city's 30,000 residents of Swedish birth or descent at the annual midsummer festival of the Swedish National Federation today.

The address, which was delivered in Swedish, concluded a visit of the Crown Prince and Princess here, which was made memorable through the presentation by Clark University, this morning, amid a scene of extraordinary academic simplicity, of the degree of doctor of science, in honor of Gustavus' work in archaeological research.

Following his address before the assembled Swedish organization, the Crown Prince left for the Prince's Crossing home of Harold Jefferson College, where he is signed by Benjamin Franklin in 1783, the Prince recalled, in his address before the national federation. Continuing, he said:

"Times have changed. The United States has developed into a world power with enormous resources. Our small country has been unable to keep pace with its friend of 1783. But the mutual good relationship remains the same, and, I venture to say, the friendship between us continues ever warm and active."

Expressed Gratification
As the Prince faced so many of his countrymen who have emigrated to the United States, he found cause to express his gratification for their contributions to the new land, and their continued love for the old. In part he said:

"It is certain that the large numbers of Swedes who have emigrated to the United States for new opportunities have contributed in a high degree toward this understanding and friendship. The outstanding trait of the Swede is his cheerful optimism, his strong faith in the future and in progress. It must have been this view of life that guided many a one to this great and wonderful land of infinite possibilities. Hopes have not always come true. Often the struggle for existence has been hard and the reward small. In their optimism, however, the Swedes have had a reserve of energy which

D. A. R. TABLET
MARKS REAL
BUNKER HILLHistorical Importance Long Neglected—Battle Was Waged on Breed's HillCHARLESTOWN VIEWS
LONG VIVID PARADENaval Secretary Opens Celebration—Famous Bonfire
Among Other Features

After a lapse of patriotic forgetfulness for 151 years the real Bunker Hill, a part of Charlestown Heights, came into its own today as a feature of the annual Bunker Hill Day celebration, when a chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution unveiled there a granite monument of bronze tablet as a permanent memorial to the battle which members note has been practically unmarked, unhonored and unsung.

Gaelic sports, a long parade in which the cadets of the Annapolis, marched, a procession of genuine, old-fashioned "horribles," and various special exercises were other features of the 1926 celebration of Charlestown's particular holiday. Curtis D. Wilbur, Secretary of the Navy, addressed a community gathering last night, while state and city officials spoke before patriotic meetings during the day.

Though students of history have always known that the "battle of Bunker Hill" was really waged on Breed's Hill, the site noted shaft is erected, the full historical importance of the real Bunker Hill has not been generally appreciated. Here, at a point about 700 yards north of Breed's Hill, nearer the water front on Mystic River, 35 feet higher in elevation, was originally the site selected for the Yankee earthworks.

Bunker Hill Not Fortified
Because of an eleven hour change in orders which historians do not fully explain, Bunker Hill was not fortified, but reinforcements under Israel Putnam waited there, and had preparations begun a few hours sooner, it is probable that the battle would have been waged on Bunker Hill in fact as well as in name. However, through the years public attention has rightly enough turned to Breed's Hill, though the name of its sister eminence has been the one remembered.

Today, through the action of Bunker Hill Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, a permanent marker is placed on the historic spot, so that the name Charlestown Heights will be memorialized permanently. Both during the revolution and immediately afterward, all the reports from both armies referred to this section, where the battle was fought, as Charlestown Heights.

In reporting the Battle of Bunker Hill to headquarters, General Burgoyne referred to it as "the attack on the heights of Charlestown," and General Gage refers to "Charlestown Heights on the north."

The gift of the monument is also a special observance of the thirtieth anniversary of the founding of Bunker Hill Chapter.

Gov. Alvan T. Fuller represented the State at the unveiling, and in a brief address emphasized the historical importance of this part of the Charlestown campaign. Robert Johnson, son of Mrs. Charles H. Johnson, vice-regent of Bunker Hill chapter, pulled the cord which unveiled the tablet, on which is inscribed: "To Commemorate Charlestown Heights, June 17, 1775."

Program for Unveiling
The program of exercises at the unveiling follows:

"America," by the band; invocation, by Miss Mary E. Elliot, chaplain of Bunker Hill chapter; salute to the flag; address by Governor Fuller; greetings, by Mrs. Clarence Churchill Hunt, regent of Bunker Hill chapter; Mrs. James Charles Peabody, state regent of Massachusetts; Mrs. Russell William Magna, vice-president general; Miss Isabel Wyman Gordon, former state regent, and Mrs. James F. Anderson; "Battle Hymn of the Republic," by the band; presentation of memorial, by Mrs. Archibald Campbell Jordan; unveiling of the tablet, by Robert Johnson; "The Star-Spangled Banner," by the band. Miss Etta H. Glidden of Charlestown, as chairman of the Bunker Hill chapter memorial committee, has had the arrangements under her charge.

Activity in Charlestown recommenced at 8 o'clock this morning with the ringing of church bells and all sorts of hilarious activities in which the youngsters set the pace. At 9 o'clock the Navy Yard guns fired a salute, and at 10 a. m. members of the Bunker Hill Monument Association made their annual pilgrimage to the monument.

At 11 a. m. Gaelic sports began on the Sullivan Square playground, with a hurling match between the Emmets and the Redmonds, and a football match between the Cork Club and the Lee Rovers.

Veterans' Societies Parade
The parade of military, civic and patriotic organizations and "horribles" took place in the afternoon. Led by a detachment of mounted police, military groups made up of first division, detachments of Coast Artillery Corps, Marine Corps, field artillery, cavalry and Naval Reserve paraded.

In the second division were groups from the American Legion, Spanish War Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, disabled veterans, gold star mothers and distinguished guests at the celebration.

usually has helped them over the difficulties.

"Nevertheless, it is chiefly thanks to the industry and honesty which also are characteristics of the Swedes that the majority have succeeded in making their way and in achieving a respected position in their new environment. They have also contributed their share in the development of this great nation. It gives me particular pleasure to state that I have heard many expressions of high regard for my kinsmen in America.

"Gradually most of our emigrants have become assimilated by the great American nation of which they are good citizens. But at the same time they form strong links in the chain of friendship which unites Sweden and the United States. The reason for this is that they have kept alive a sense of solidarity with the old country. It appears to me that you have understood or rather felt the importance for the individual of not losing contact with that particular culture which originally was his own. There are many proofs of this: your frequent visits to the old home to gather new energy in its refreshing altitudes and quiet ways of life and to renew contacts with friends and kin; your solicitude in maintaining numerous church or-

Through Blackstone Valley

In the blue and gold of the hours just before mid-morning the royal party rode swiftly through the beautiful Blackstone Valley. Provided a view of the ineffable calm of rural New England for a Prince who is directly interested in agriculture, farmhouses, silvered by a century and more of patient history, took his gaze now and again from rolling uplands clad in a parquetry of jade and broad fields serenely bordering new plantings.

To cross the city line into Worcester was, for the Prince and Princess, to come conspicuously close to their own people. In Quinsigamond thousands of Swedish people live. The section was brave, as dawn flung forth rose and saffron veils, in the red, white and blue of American, and the soft blue and yellow of the Swedish colors. Humble homes, had all, their knots of color and flowers. The crowds which lined the curbing, cheering and waving as the motor-cavalcade swept through, leaving behind a hurried glimpse of a tall prince, smiling, gesturing, lifting his top hat, and a serene princess bowing sedately and smiling too, were eloquent indication of the still greater crowds that would pour into the fair grounds this afternoon. Through the city's business section, where were to be seen on all sides the colors of the United States and Sweden the line of cars swept. Hos-

Swedish Minister

The Prince and Princess, members of their party including Wollmar Boström, Swedish Minister to the United States; Robert Woods Bliss, United States Minister to Sweden, and Mrs. Bliss and 40 guests, including Governor and Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, were guests at luncheon of Mr. and Mrs. George N. Jeppson, at their beautiful home in Drury Lane.

Mr. Jeppson is president of the Norton Company, which employs many Swedish skilled workers. Luncheon was extremely simple, with no attempt made to reproduce Swedish modes or manners of entertainment.

The Jeppson house is set on a small plot in a quiet west angle of Bancroft Hill at the entrance to the beautiful wooded roadway that bears, curiously enough, the name of an historic playhouse in Princess Louise's native England. There is a curved driveway and a red brick footpath. Blue spruces keep vigil with swaying censers of spiced fragrance. Rhododendrons are brilliant in their vestments of muted rose and ivory and magenta. A gentle lawn slopes to Park Avenue, and through a mass of shrubbery there is intermittent glimpse to the sumptuous scene. Keeping march with the hours about a glittering sundial.

On the terrace overlooking the lawn the royal party and guests lunched. The Prince and Princess and members of their suite sat upon a circular dais in view of the other guests, who were seated at a long table on the terrace. American and Swedish flags, blue bachelors buttons and gold irises and lilies marked the decorations. An informal reception in the drawing room anticipated the luncheon, and at a bit after 2 the royal party entered the gates where thousands of members of the Swedish National Federation waited in obvious enthusiasm for them.

The Prince bowed again and again, and as he bowed silver highlight flashed on his robes at every motion. Immediately at the conclusion of the exercises, the royal party again entered motors and sped to the home for the aged on Harvard Street where a short stop was made to greet some of the people of the Prince's country.

deous welcome beat across the air as a goodly proportion of Worcester's 30,000 Swedish residents, and hundreds more from all over New England and far beyond its horizons, cheered and greeted the visitors variously in English and the Scandinavian.

From Greendale, at the northern end of Worcester and in the immediate vicinity of the fairgrounds there were men and women, even children, who knew that the demand for mechanical skill which urged them to settle near such manufacturers as the Norton Company, Crompton & Knowles Company and Curtis & Marble Company is shared by the Crown Prince. From Quinsigamond Village, seven miles to the southeast, came hundreds more, in the Quinsigamond Village square there hangs today a flag given by a member of the Swedish Royal House to the late Charles H. Morgan, one time superintendent of the Washburn & Moen Manufacturing Company, predecessor to the American Steel & Wire Worcester works which employed so many Swedish workers. This was 40 years ago. Then the flag was the emblem of the united countries Norway and Sweden. The flag is now in the custody of the first Swedish Methodist Church and was raised today at the community grounds by Godfrey Nyström and Councilman G. Adolph Johnson.

Karl G. Friden acted as chairman of the committee on arrangements for the Swedish National Federation in this three-day annual midsummer festival which has, each year, national importance for members of the organizations. Peter G. Holmes acts as master of ceremonies and will introduce the Crown Prince to the audience when he makes the address in Swedish which is to be the climax of his several hours' stay among his countrymen in Worcester.

Upon the platform with the royal party were Governor and Mrs. Fuller, Mayor and Mrs. Michael J. O'Hara of Worcester, and Representative George R. Stobbs. The Mendelssohn Glee Club of the First Lu-

TEXAS WOMAN OPENS CAMPAIGN AGAINST GOVERNOR FERGUSON

Mrs. Wilmans Says She Wishes to "Vindicate Name of Woman" in Politics

ITALY, Tex., June 17 (P)—Mrs. Edith Wilmans of Dallas, who was the first woman legislator of Texas, formally opened her campaign for Governor here with a speech outlining her platform and comparing her qualifications with those of her opponents. She declared that unless she is Gov. Miriam A. Ferguson's opponent in the run-off primary, the present Governor would be re-elected.

Mrs. Wilmans said she was as well qualified for the position as any of the candidates and better qualified than some, since she had both a legal and a business training, as well as being the mother of three children, and that she was in the race "to vindicate the name of woman" in Texas political and civil affairs.

factions with those of all the candidates except Mrs. Ferguson, explaining that in the case of the Governor she would have to compare herself with "Mr. Jim" as it is accepted, she said, "that Mrs. Ferguson does not make any claim to being qualified to manage the affairs of Texas as the Governor, and that she concedes that it is Jim who is the real manager."

On the question of prohibition, she said: "I am opposed to the unlawful sale of liquor in any form, whether by the bootlegger or the illicit druggate prescription method, but I believe that this should be accomplished by a more rigid enforcement of our laws as they are now on the statute books and not by an amendment to the Volstead Act."

LABOR DEBATES
SEAMEN'S CODE

Conference Discusses Repatriation, Desertion, Sanctions, and Other Issues

By Special Cable

GENEVA, June 17.—The ninth session of the International Labor Conference, which has been devoted entirely to maritime questions, is drawing to a close. Today the plenary conference will begin the discussion of questions submitted to a sub-committee which will hand in its report. The main subject before the conference has been the international seamen's code, and on many points connected with this code there has been a lively division of opinion between the ship-owners and the seamen. The employers have tried to extend the class of vessels excluded from the code, such as fishing vessels and those engaged in coastal and home trade.

The definition of what such trade means has been the subject of many hours' discussion. Similarly, the report of a committee dealing with the question of the repatriation of sailors, that is to say, the obligation of ship-owners to return seamen to the country of their origin, also led to a lively debate regarding exactly where a repatriated sailor should be landed in his own country.

Penalties for Desertion

Thus, if he signed on at Southampton, Eng., would the ship-owners' obligation be fulfilled if the seaman were returned to Liverpool? Andrew Furuseth, chairman of the American Seamen's Federation, although not taking part in the work of the conference, has been busy lobbying on the subject of what penalties should be inflicted according to the internal code on a seaman who deserts his ship. The American view differs from the European view as to the enormity of this offense a seaman of the United States being entitled to leave his ship at any port, without incurring penalties for desertion. No European shipowner would consent to such a provision.

Graduated Scale Sought

What the International Labor Office aims at is a graduated scale of sanctions for this offense. In fact, the object is to find a common denominator between the employers' and the seamen's views. If the Labor Office had aimed too high in the code which it has drawn up, the employers would have refused to accept it; if too low, the workers would have refused to discuss it.

Hence the necessity of finding a compromise between the highest and the lowest standards of employment, for the International Labor Office has always to remember that the code has to be ratified by governments concerned. There has been no attempt to lay down a scale of payments or conditions of employment. That may come later. The present maritime conference is limited to arriving at a compromise on the articles of agreement. The question of the hours of work has now been postponed to a special conference which will be held in 1928.

Cecil Plan Regarding Seats

Seems Likely to Be Dropped
By Cable from Monitor Bureau
LONDON, June 17.—The committee for the consideration of the composition of the League of Nations Council is scheduled to hold a meeting on June 28 to decide the question of permanent seats, but the impression gains ground in diplomatic circles here that the meeting will not take place. Instead there is the prospect of a special Council session being called for August to make the final decision regarding the presentation to the Assembly of the "Cecil plan" for the election of temporary members to the Council. The committee, with the exception of Spain and Brazil, was ultimately unanimously in favor of the Cecil plan of increasing the number of temporary seats to nine elected for three years on a system of rotation, the Assembly to have the right of waiving the necessity of retiring in respect to three members.

Sweden, however, supported by several other states, only agreed to the plan provided it solved the existing crisis in the League, which was the plan resulting in Spain and Brazil both announcing their intention of not standing as candidates at the next election for the Council, evidently the Cecil scheme did not do. There is, consequently, a strong hold of opinion in the League which favors dropping the Cecil plan on the grounds that the election of Germany to the League can now be carried out.

ETHICS IN TRADE
WORK OF ROTARY

International Relations Are Smoothed by Honesty in Business, Is Theme

DENVER, Colo., June 17 (Special).—Permanent world peace achieved through the medium of better business relations, internationally applied—this is the thought steadily emerging and taking definite shape from the deliberations of several thousand delegates to the seventeenth annual convention of Rotary International.

It is significant to observers that speech after speech made by leaders of Rotary thought makes reference to the practical value of unselfish service in business and professional contacts between individuals and nations.

Emphasis is placed upon individual contributions to the welfare of society without expectation of return. Quotations from the Bible are frequent. The Golden Rule is set up as "the universal rule of world-wide business," the practice of which will eventually bring all nations into a universal brotherhood.

Business Ethics as Peace Aid
A paper prepared by T. C. Thomsen of Copenhagen, Denmark, read Thursday by A. S. "Paul" Graves of London, contained the following statement:

"There is no question about the fact that economic conflicts are the principal causes of war. Improvement in business ethics will, therefore, tend to prevent that explosive accumulation of ill-feeling and national jealousy which, if allowed to go on long enough, unquestionably leads to war and destruction. Just as in business life, the development is steadily toward arbitration instead of litigation, so, many believe, in international life arbitration will sooner or later replace settlement by war."

Charles E. White, a retail merchant of Belfast, Ireland, in the course of an address on "Rotary's Conception of World-Wide Business," said: "The greatest word in the English language is love. The Golden Rule could not be improved upon. The rule has reference to the business of supplying men's necessities. It has a note of finality. It is, therefore, the universal rule of world-wide business."

Recognition of Spiritual Values

Tom J. Davis, a lawyer of Butte, Mont., nominated for president of Rotary International, made a stirring plea for the recognition of spiritual values in business, declaring that the peace of the world will be insured when business men of all nations learn to transact business in accordance with the principles of love, sincerity, integrity and confidence.

Large Registration

A report by the registration committee chairman was to the effect that a total of 8584 persons have registered for the convention to date, with many others not yet registered.

Among later addresses the following have been notable: "Serving Society Through Your Vocation," by Giorgio Mylius, manufacturer of Milan, Italy; "Rotary's Membership Basis—A Test of Time," by L. B. Sutton, merchant of Tampico, Mex.; "Need of Continual Growth in Membership," by John T. Symes, commercial banker of Lockport, N. Y.; "Value of Service," by Horace Dunbar, Los Angeles; "Administrative Continuity," by Harry S. Fish, director of Rotary International, Sayre, Pa.; "Ostend Convention," by Guy Gundaker, past president, Rotary International, of Philadelphia, and "Developing the Individual," by Sir Henry Y. Braddon, honorary special commissioner, Rotary International, Sydney, Aust.

A ball given in the Denver Auditorium in honor of the president, Donald A. Adams of New Haven, Conn., was the most brilliant social affair of the convention.

INTERNATIONAL
MINERS TO MEET

Embargo on Coal Is to Be Discussed—British Labor Passes Resolution

LONDON, June 17 (AP).—A. J. Cook, secretary of the British Miners' Federation, announced today that the International Miners' Federation will meet in London on June 23, possibly to discuss either an embargo on coal or an international strike.

The Parliamentary Labor Party has voted to resist strenuously the proposals outlined by the Premier, Stanley Baldwin, in the House of Commons, regarding the reorganization of the coal industry.

The members, at a special meeting presided over by the former premier, Ramsay MacDonald, voted unanimously for a resolution declaring the Government's declaration of policy on the mining crisis regarding hours and wages was a violation of the recommendations made in the report of the royal commission.

The resolution also stated the Government's policy was inadequate to meet the problems of the industry and was a surrender to the demands of the mine owners.

By Special Cable

MOSCOW, June 17.—The Presidium of the Soviet Trade Union Council publishes a resolution declaring that the British trade union funds to aid the British coal strikers, "represents an attack on the freedom of the working class of our country to show brotherly aid to the workers of other countries to that degree and form which it may consider necessary."

The resolution continues: "The Trade Union declare that they helped, and are helping, and will help the striking workers in England because the miners' cause is our cause no matter what the Government protecting the mine owners may think about this." The miners of the Donetsk basin and other regions have voted to contribute one-half per cent of the monthly wages to support the British miners.

CLERICAL DOMINATION

By Special Cable

VIENNA, June 17.—While the Socialist forces in Czechoslovakia are massing in opposition to the combined Agrarian and Clerical strength, partly on clerical issues, so in Austria, the Socialists are rising against the clerically-influenced government. The imminent resignation of the Austrian Education Minister, Dr. Schneider, owing to his concessions to the Socialists regarding religious instruction in schools being opposed by the Chancellor, Dr. Ramek is only one phase of the situation.

Socialists here are threatening to force new elections, for they feel an appeal must be made to their countrymen if the Government carries through its original program of bringing the schools under complete clerical domination, thus undoing the great part of the Socialists' school reform plan pursued since the founding of the republic.

A FREE kindergarten was established in the poorer district of a large city and its doors thrown open to all who cared to attend. This was the means of bringing much joy and happiness to many children, whose home life was often cheerless and comfortless.

A little one, of four years, upon the second day of her attendance, stole quietly up to the side of her teacher and whispered, in suppressed joy, "Do the angels live here?"

One of the mothers said that she had great difficulty in getting her little boy to wash his face. One day, after leaving home for the kindergarten, he came running back to ask if his face was clean. Upon being asked the cause for such unusual procedure, the boy replied, "My teacher kissed me yesterday and she might want to do it again."

San Bernardino, Calif.

Special Correspondence

ONE day recently two friends went out along the upland road toward San Bernardino to see the wild flowers. In a happy place sheltered by the foothills, out of a great profusion they gathered scarlet larkspur, wild blue penstemon, golden yarrow, and a few late Mariposa lilies. Though it was late in the season and earlier comers had apparently gathered the first blossoms, they were happy to see no traces of wantonness, no destruction of the wild flower plants. Here and there flowered a snowy yucca, now protected by law.

On returning by another road, a tall, glorious, showy, yellow bush bordering the highway was passed. They stopped and went back to it to observe it. On either side of the road, barely off the paving, there grew many more splendid clumps with tall yellow sprays blossoming out of lacy gray green foliage. On each a thin board had been set up, bearing the following words: "Very rare. Golden eardrops or Diente. Please leave for all to enjoy." In smaller letters it was signed, "A Nature Lover."

The meek command had done its work. Not a spray had been touched. Similar signs were read now on this side of the road, now on that! And they drove on grateful for the beauty of the golden eardrops, but more grateful for the indications of a gentler, finer, more loving regard of man for his fellow men.

TURKEY MAY ENTER LEAGUE

No Further Obstacle Exists to Its Admission—Brazil's Intent Uncertain

By Special Cable

GENEVA, June 17.—The Brazilian delegation at Geneva is still without instructions from its Government as to whether it should cease co-operation with the League of Nations. Although notice of withdrawal has been given by the Government, two years must elapse before Brazil need in fact cease collaboration with the League. While it affords no actual test of Brazil's intentions, the fact that the Brazilian delegate continued to sit on the disarmament committee and actually recorded his vote is considered a hopeful sign that Brazil does not intend to withdraw altogether from Geneva.

But the disarmament conference and its committees, it must be remembered, are international rather than League. In the meantime it is hoped a new recruit will be found for the League in the admission of Turkey to the Assembly in September. Now Turkey has come to terms with Great Britain and France over Arab and Syrian mandates respectively, there is no further obstacle to Turkey's entrance into the League.

It is also felt that Turkey has special reasons for seeking admission, for its relations with Russia have become rather strained, and it is always possible that some power might cast envious eyes on the thinly-peopled plains of Asia Minor.

MEN'S SINGLES
DOWN TO EIGHT

Other Events in M. V. Tennis Are Also Nearing the Finals

KANSAS CITY, Mo., June 17 (Special)—The field of players in the twenty-fifth annual Missouri Valley tennis championship has narrowed to eight players in the men's singles, four in the junior singles and two in the women's singles. Some second-round matches remain to be played in the men's doubles, women's doubles and junior doubles.

Five of the eight players left in the men's singles are residents of the Missouri Valley while two others are representing the Eastern section and one the South. Winners of the four matches today will enter the semifinal round.

In the upper bracket W. D. Brown opposes C. J. Meyer and Berkeley Bell plays H. Hyde while in the lower half of the draw P. A. Bagby meets Harold Coggeshall, and F. W. Coen Jr. encounters A. H. Chapin Jr. The match between Bell and Hyde is expected to be the feature of the men's singles. Hyde's greater tournament experience may give him a victory over the local junior star.

Three of the four matches scheduled for this afternoon in the women's singles are likely to be exciting. Miss Margaret Gage, a former title holder, while in another match, C. S. Sigot, meets Mrs. E. S. Park, one of the early winners of the Valley event. Miss Susan Brandt should contend Miss Margaret Gage, who is expected to be the feature of the women's singles.

There were two exciting matches played in the various events yesterday. Coggeshall defeated W. M. Rogers in the fourth round of the men's singles after battling for 12 games. The score was 7-5, 8-6. Meyer was forced to a three-set contest by W. J. Settle, the Texas player, in another interesting singles match. Settle, of the St. Louis district junior, gave Bagby, Kansas State champion, plenty of competition in their fourth round contest. Bagby won 6-1, 3-6, 6-2.

The only three-set match in the junior singles was that in which L. J. Quick defeated C. S. Sigot. Steadler playing enabled Sigot to win the opening set only to have Quick come back and capture the second set. The third set proved a thrilling tennis and 14 games were played before a decision was reached.

In the final set Quick followed by taking four games in a row. Sigot led at 5 to 4 and 6 to 1 later in the set but Quick's steady play won the match. The third set was a thrilling tennis and 14 games were played before a decision was reached.

Harvard and Yale
1929 Will Not Meet

Six Eli Oarsmen on Probation—Crimson in Second Varsity Race

NEW HAVEN, Conn., June 17 (AP)—Violation of the honor system by six members of the Yale freshman crew has caused the abandonment of the freshman race the curtain raiser of the day's activities at the annual Yale-Harvard regatta at New London, June 25.

Announcement of the calling off of the regular freshman race was made last night by the Yale Athletic Association following an all-day conference of the executive committee of the board of control of the association and numerous telephone conversations with Harvard athletic authorities.

The names of the men who were placed on probation and disqualified from athletic competition for the academic year 1926-27 were not made public. It is understood that they were members of the Yale crew team which the crew men took last week at their quarters at Gales Ferry on the Thames River. The men involved admitted the facts of the situation, the association's statement on the matter said.

The executive committee has recommended the award of medals to those members of the freshman crew squad at the Ferry who were not involved in the action. Yale in consequence of the facts of the situation to Harvard also communicated its "deepest regrets and apologies."

In lieu of the regular freshman crew race, the association has scheduled a Junior varsity eight row in the Junior varsity event which is scheduled for 10 a. m. at the same place. The Harvard crew would rather participate in that race than meet a makeshift Blue eight was indicated by the association's statement.

Director Bingham said he expected to conduct the Harvard crew's final decision to Yale authorities after his conference with coach and crew.

REMARKABLE WORK BY TROJAN ATHLETES

LOS ANGELES, June 17—One world, one United States, three intercollegiate, two Pacific Coast, three Big Ten, and five Southern California records were broken by the University of Southern California track and field team this season. Capt. C. L. Houser '26 set the world mark in the discus at 158 ft. 14 in.; Lee S. Barnes '26 pole vaulted 13 ft. 6 in.; the American record; Leighton W. Dye '26 and Ken D. Grumbles '26 hurled 14.6 ft. and 23.6 ft. for Coast marks in the high and low jumps. The conference high hurdle record at 14.8 ft. and Houser set conference shot and discus records at 50 ft. 7 1/4 in. and 154 ft. 10 in., respectively, and the Drake discus mark at 147 ft. 1 1/2 in.

The five Southern California marks are: Houser, shot, 50 ft. 7 1/4 in.; Barnes, pole, 13 ft. 6 in.; Dye, high hurdle, 14.6 ft.; Grumbles, low hurdle, 23.6 ft.; and Houser, discus, 154 ft. 10 in.

YALE VARSITY CREW PLEASES ITS COACH

GALES FERRY, Conn., June 17 (AP)—The Yale varsity eight rowed another time trial over the four-mile course here on the Thames river this afternoon, rowing downstream with both wind and current.

The junior varsity and combination shells also had time trials over the two-mile course. J. H. Whitney '26, captain of the junior varsity, was not in his place, but he is expected to return to the lineup.

The freshman crew did not row.

Zu Zu's Marbles

THERE were 12 of them—or rather there had been 12—lovely little red marbles, so small that Zu Zu, who was little Hannah's little cat, could take them up in his mouth, one at a time, and carry them about without anyone's knowing that he had anything in his mouth at all. And that's just what he did with each one.

Little Hannah would throw a marble onto the bare floor of the hall, and Zu Zu, no matter where he was, would hear it and give chase. He rolled it about, running and sliding on the polished wood, poking it daintily with his paw when it stopped rolling, and finally picking it up in his mouth and hiding it away somewhere.

Sometimes he hid it in the wood basket that stood beside the hearth, sometimes under a cushion or rug, sometimes in a favorite box beside the kitchen range. It turned up first in one place and then in another until, finally, there came a day when it couldn't be found at all, and little Hannah gave him another one to play with.

Things went on this way for quite a while, one marble after another going until every one of the 12 marbles had disappeared. Not a single one could be found anywhere. Then little Hannah took Zu Zu up on her lap and talked to him very seriously.

"Zu Zu," she said, holding him around his fore paws and looking into his face very earnestly, "where have you hidden your marbles? Do you understand what I'm saying? Oh, how I wish you could talk!"

But Zu Zu only squirmed a bit, till he loosened her hold, and then he put out one little paw and tapped her cheek, saying, "Mew!" in a tiny little voice. Little Hannah laughed and put him down and he ran away with little Hannah after him.

"I'm going to have a good look for them," said she. "They must be somewhere."

So she looked under the couch and in the cracks of the chairs and around the radiators and everywhere she could think of, and Zu Zu looked with her, poking his head under her hand and saying "Mew!" in a tiny little voice. At last she gave it up.

"Now, Zu Zu," she said, "you must find them yourself. You ought to know where you put them."

"Mew!" said Zu Zu again in a tiny little voice, and he began walking up and down restlessly, going from the sitting-room into the hall and back again. "Mew, mew!"

At last little Hannah noticed that every time he passed the end of the bookcase he looked at it very quickly and said "Mew!" again. So she jumped up and looked behind the bookshelves. It was dark and she couldn't see anything, so she poked a finger behind, and what do you think she felt? A little round marble! Then Mother came and moved the heavy bookcase just a bit, and there they all were—the whole 12 of them!

Little Hannah took them all out and put them into a bag, Zu Zu watching all the time. Then she took one out of the bag and threw it onto the hall floor, and away went Zu Zu after it! He played with it happily for some time, then he picked it up in his mouth and jumped up onto the back of the chair where little Hannah sat reading. Resting his paws on her shoulder, he dropped the marble into her lap and rubbed up against her cheek, saying "Mew!" again in a tiny little voice.

Little Hannah gave him a big hug and said, "He's just saying 'Thank you,' Mother, I understand what he says."

"There's one language all can understand," said Mother. "I heard the big girls talking about that," said little Hannah. "I forget what they called it. Something like 'Spain,' I think."

"Esperanto, you mean," said Mother. "But Zu Zu wouldn't understand that. The language I mean has no words. Guess again!"

The Diary of Snubs, Our Dog

Joan invited me to take a walk with her this afternoon—said I could be her escort!

That sounded interesting to me and I accepted right away and started off at a lively gallop!

Hadn't gone far though when she called me back—'That's no way for an escort to act!'—she said. 'You're supposed to trot along by my side.'

Well, I tried to do that but something was always attracting my attention and before I would hardly realize it I'd be half a block ahead of her!

She finally put a stop to it though. Picked me up and put me into the carriage with the dolls—said I made a better passenger than an escort!

WATERLOO BRIDGE TO GET "REPRIEVE"

LONDON, June 17.—A royal commission is to be appointed to review "impartially and authoritatively" the much-disputed question of new bridges over the Thames in London.

This was announced by Stanley Baldwin, the Premier, in the House of Commons last night.

It is understood to mean at least a temporary "reprieve" for the beautiful but dilapidated Waterloo Bridge, also reconsideration of the proposed bridge near Ludgate Hill, which is opposed as liable to injure St. Paul's Cathedral.

DUTCH NOTE TO MEXICO ON OIL LAW REPORTED

MEXICO CITY, June 17.—The Foreign Office has officially admitted it has received a note from the Dutch Minister, Baron van Asbeck, concerning Mexico's oil and land laws. It declined to divulge the details.

Unofficially, however, there is every reason to believe that the Dutch Government has refused to accept certain portions of the law. Baron van Asbeck declined to confirm or deny a report that the notice reserved to Dutch subjects full liberty of action with regard to the petroleum and land laws.

SCOTTISH WOMEN JOIN PILGRIMAGE

Advocates of "No More War" Leave Edinburgh for London

By Special Cable

EDINBURGH, June 17.—Twenty women, advocates of "No More War," who are walking part of the way to London from Edinburgh to participate in the peace rally in Hyde Park next Saturday, received a hearty bon voyage on their departure. A crowd of supporters are following them about to Newcastle, where they will entrain for London, meetings being held en route.

Before leaving Edinburgh, messages were read at a gathering in Charlotte Square, from the Lord Provost, General Sir Ian Hamilton and Mrs. Basil Williams of the local branch of the League of Nations Union, Sir Harry Lauder also wished the travelers success, saying, "arbitration is common sense." Sir Ian Hamilton called the pilgrimage "a great adventure." A resolution was unanimously adopted, declaring "to the pilgrims that their supporters believed that conciliation and arbitration should take the place of war in the settlement of international disputes, and urged the British Government to take the lead in the proposed disarmament conference of the League of Nations."

BRYN MAWR AWARDS ENTRY TEST PRIZES

BRYN MAWR, Pa., June 17 (Special).—Matriculation scholarship awards valued at $100 each at Bryn Mawr College, based on records in its own entrance examinations, have been announced by Dr. Marion Edwards Park, president of the college. For these awards the United States is divided into four districts: New England states, New York, New Jersey and Delaware; Pennsylvania and southern states; and the western states. The winner for New England, Mary Geraldine Goggin of Dorchester, Mass., prepared at Girls' Latin School, Boston.

ITALY'S DEFENSE OF LIRA COST $3,000,000

By Special Cable

ROME, June 17.—Speaking before the Senate last evening Count Volpi disclosed the action taken by the Italian Treasury for defense of the lira. Since July, 1925, the loss suffered by the Italian Treasury to sustain the lira in the world market has been only $8,000,000, the equivalent of $3,000,000.

The sacrifice is negligible, concluded Count Volpi, when it is considered that the defense of 40,000,000,000 lira is at stake.

GRECO-JUGOSLAV TREATY PLANNED

Steps Taken for Renewal of Negotiations

By Special Cable

BELGRADE, June 17.—The first steps have been taken, according to well-informed sources, on the initiative of the Greek Government, for a renewal of the negotiations for a treaty of alliance between Greece and Yugoslavia.

The Greek Minister in Belgrade, Mr. Polychroniades, submitted several proposals for conventions as the basis for a renewal of the discussions.

The Belgrade Government will examine the proposals and attempt to give a speedy reply.

The parliamentary financial committee has accepted the proposed settlement of war debts with the United States.

SEARCH IS STARTED FOR ARGENTINE FLIER

PARA, Brazil, June 17.—The tug Pelorus, chartered by La Nacion of Buenos Aires, has started to search for Bernardo Duggan, Argentine aviator, and his companions, who were last seen over Cayenne, French Guiana, Sunday morning, on their attempted flight from New York to Buenos Aires.

The Argentine Foreign Minister has instructed the Vice-Consul here to charter another tug quickly. The Brazilian Minister of Navy has ordered a cutter to join in the search.

SEEK TO IMPLEMENT LABOR PROVISIONS

Canadian Parliamentary Committee Deals With Treaties

OTTAWA, Ont., June 17 (Special).

The report of the parliamentary committee on industrial relations, tabled in the House of Commons, recommends the calling of a conference of provincial and dominion representatives, intimately in touch with labor conditions throughout Canada, to consult as to the best means to be employed of giving effect to the labor provisions of the treaties of peace.

Particular attention was given by the committee to a resolution passed by the House, "That a wage sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of living should constitute a legal minimum wage," and the report states that the evidence shows that "the principle of the minimum wage" as applied to women was working most satisfactorily, and might well be applied to certain classes at least of men's wages.

It was also found that some workers were receiving less than will enable them to maintain a reasonable standard of living. "Such an injustice," states the report, "is manifestly unfair and unbusinesslike, inasmuch as it costs the country much, involving as it does an excess of unrest, illhealth and crime."

RUSSIA BUYS HIDES

Effect of Changing Values on English Domestic Architecture

By H. J. BIRNSTINGL

CHANGING conditions in the life and habits of a nation must reflect themselves sooner or later in domestic architecture, and it is because of the swift changes which the habits and outlook of the English people are undergoing that a new type of domestic architecture is shaping itself. I am not referring now to what we are pleased to call the working-class house, or to the horrible shoddy little dwelling, flimsy together with any rubbish, which are springing up and defacing the countryside. These are subjects upon which I have already written in these columns. I am thinking rather of the better class house; the kind of house, in fact, in the designing of which the bulk of the architectural profession depends for its livelihood. The changes are due primarily to two causes: a redistribution of wealth and a change in social values.

A New Century

This redistribution of wealth was, of course, in progress long before the war, but during and since that event it has accelerated, so that today the landed gentry who 60 years ago were still the backbone of England have passed out of existence, and with them the large comfortable houses with their roomy stone-floored kitchens—placed usually a long way from the dining room—with their many larders, butteries, dairies, with their uncomfortable servants' quarters, and their vast breakfasts. And for the same class of person a somewhat smaller house, planned with a sense of household economy and of comfort for the staff has arisen. But owners of these newer houses have not their roots in land as had their predecessors, for their money no longer comes from their land, but from some town enterprise. And this fundamental change is expressed in some subtle way in the whole tenor of the architecture.

But the biggest change was yet to come. Hitherto the upkeep of the house—the home—was regarded as the principal item upon which expenditure of income should be made, the education of the children and the setting aside of sums to set them in life as they grew up—marriage for the girls, some career for the boys—coming next. Today that has completely changed, and expenditure on the home has been greatly curtailed in order that money may be available to satisfy a craving for continual movement, chiefly by motor, but also abroad by boat and train, for amusements of all kinds; theaters, cinemas, spectacular sporting events, dining in luxurious restaurants, night clubs and dancing in public places. A complete revaluation has, in fact, taken place in the expenditure of income, to the detriment of the home.

Entertaining Lessens

Cause and effect are often so inextricably bound up with each other, acting and reacting upon each other, as to make it well-nigh impossible to say what is cause and what effect. Thus the redistribution of wealth has had its effect in increasing the difficulty of obtaining and paying for an adequate domestic staff, so augmenting the tendency to dine out, and reducing the sizes of dining-rooms and the whole scale of entertaining. Sixty years ago there were no public restaurants as we understand them today. Chop houses and taverns served a very different fare and supplied a very different clientele from the modern restaurants. Yet 60 years ago, although the facilities for getting about were few and slow, there was much more entertaining, particularly in the form of dinner parties.

An interesting example of the comparatively small allotment of income which the home receives can be seen in London today. All over the better residential parts there were, and still are, mews. Thus one will find in a small area, Pembroke Road, Gardens, Square, Terrace, Crescent and also Pembroke Mews. Here, those householders who had their carriages would keep them. The lower part of the mews consisted of coach house, stable and harness room, the upper part of a dwelling for the coachman and his family. Today many of these mews are converted into dwellings for the same class as—perhaps, for the very children of—those who before lived in the large houses and had their coachman in the mews. The coach house, or part of it, is used to garage the ubiquitous and essential car, and the remainder of the premises is turned into an exigent but by no means unpleasant residence with a sitting-room, small kitchen and larder and two or three bedrooms. Here there can be no attempt at entertaining or showing hospitality on a large scale.

Labor Saving Devices

It is the difficulty of obtaining domestic servants, together with the desire for time and money for movement and excitement, which has given such impetus to the labor-saving movement; a movement that has had a great effect upon architecture, and even upon the design of furniture. The aim of the labor-saving house is to eliminate all that is superfluous, and an attempt to determine what is superfluous presupposes some scale of values, for clearly it is difficult to find anything which is either absolutely superfluous or absolutely necessary. But the aim today seems to be to obtain the maximum physical comfort with the minimum physical labor.

It will be seen that such an ideal ignores the effect upon the intellect and character of objects of beauty whose presence about a house entails labor. Put in a cruder form the householder today would rather have time and money to visit the picture house than he would spend the one in his own home and the other in making his home sufficiently beautiful and interesting to attract him to stay in it. No sooner is a beautiful thing made than it is upkept and labor, and those whose daily task it was to dust china or to polish furniture and silver, were in their particular way as necessary to the maintenance of beauty as the creative artist and craftsman. No one resents the time spent by a subordinate in cleaning and oiling machinery, for it is realized that without these humble attentions the machine would soon become inefficient and ultimately derelict. Few resent the hundreds of thousands of pounds spent annually in maintaining our ancient and beautiful buildings in a tolerable state of repair. Yet the employment of a domestic servant upon the upkeep of beautiful things about a house and even of the house itself is often resented. Then, too, architecture suffers today through the passing away of the rich, cultured and leisured patron. True, attempts are being made to demonstrate that great art is in no wise dependent upon either size or cost, but this argument will not bear close examination. Perfect though a sonnet may be, there is not the sustained effort, the breadth of vision, the depth of thought that goes to make a great epic, and so the sonata, the wood-cut and the cottage, perfect though each may be within its limitations, can never compare as great artistic achievements with the symphony, the noteworthy oil painting, or the great house.

Fine attempts are being made to meet the needs and changes of today, and many a modern house with its leanness, its clean-run lines, its repose and balance, is a fit descendant of the great strain of English domestic architecture, but no one can fail to notice the changes, the elimination of the superfluous, an absence of moldings, a diminution of the feeding and entertainment departments and their services, a great development of the white tile business, which has crept from the bathroom, where it originated, into the kitchen and scullery. It is possible that in a few years a reaction may set in, and with it a desire for leisure and interest in the home may revive. If this does come about, the change will, then as now, undoubtedly be reflected in the contemporary domestic architecture.

Charles Bulfinch

Charles Bulfinch, Architect and Citizen, by Charles A. Place, Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, $15.

The story of the life and work of Charles Bulfinch is filled with details of service and activity. As architect alone he would have contributed more than a substantial share. As architect and citizen, one marvels at his energies. The story of his life and work reads romantically in its connection with the growth of Boston, a century ago. The transitions from town to city, from a small settlement to a great expansion and Bulfinch made many of the plans for the new buildings. He concerned himself with civic betterment by acting on committees in official functions as well. He "participated as a European in all the important enterprises that expanded the land area and made possible the future growth of Boston."

Mr. Place has gathered many loose ends together in this book and shown the difficulties that were encountered and surmounted. He describes the controversies and transactions, as well as the building and development of new parts of the town. Lovers of old Boston will find a wealth of valuable information in this volume, in addition to many practical details in matters of costs, contracts, etc. The author has described the many famous buildings that were planned and designed by Bulfinch, and one has an opportunity to learn the true character of the early American architecture.

In his hands the designs, although inspired by European houses, took on the simplicity and austerity, the dignity and harmony that were symbolic of the life here at the time. Faneuil Hall, the Massachusetts State Capitol, University Hall, Cambridge, and numerous of the fine old residences on Beacon Hill added to several churches show an enormous achievement to the credit of this famous architect whose substantial contribution is well worth the esteem given it in this volume by Mr. Place. The numerous illustrations add considerable interest to the book.

Photoplay Notes

Charles Paddock, who holds many world's records at sprint distances, will make his debut as featured player with Bebe Daniels in "The College Fling," a comedy drama centering around college life, which she is about to start, under the direction of Clarence Badger.

Sometimes the life of a screen writer is not so trying. Raymond Griffith collected a number of them and has taken them to sea on a yacht. Before they come ashore again Griffith expects to have his new comedy, "You'd Be Surprised," ready to be photographed.

Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer has purchased four stories by Peter B. Kyne for filming: "Little Casino," "Silver Threads Among the Gold," "The Desert Odyssey," and "Big Tim McGeary."

Douglas MacLean is about to start production on his new comedy, temporarily titled "Ladies First." The plot is based on an original story and has been worked out during the past several weeks by a staff of writers. William Beaudine is to direct it.

Florence Vidor and Ricardo Cortez have been cast in the leading roles in "Captain Sazarc," a story of "gentlemen adventurers of the sea," which will be his first picture under his new Paramount contract. Arlette Marchal, the French screen player, who was "discovered" in "Madame Sans Gêne," Gloria Swanson's Paris-made picture, has been selected to play the chief feminine role opposite Jack Holt in Zane Grey's story, "Florin River," which Paramount is to make with John Waters directing. Miss Marchal is at present playing a featured role in Marshall Neilan's production, "Diplomacy."

Chicago Art Notes

Chicago, June 14

Special from Monitor Bureau

THE Art Institute interest in the annual exhibition of work in this great school of more than 200 students attending classes days, nights and Saturdays. Contrary to the rules of academic routine, the varied collection of paintings, drawings, sculpture and applied arts has a new share. The fine old fundamental exercises are there. But every wall illustrates adventure and initiative in composition, color contrasts and a confidence on the part of the student that he is pursuing the changing vistas of the present toward a revealing future. There is decision and vigor, hopeful of what is to come.

Traditions Endure

The small sculpture inventions escape repetitions of the classics for more original points of view. The applied arts, and the arts of the book in particular, are on the margin and possibly within the class of professional work. Throughout the galleries the viewer is conscious of an awakening to artistic balance and the intervention of latter day ideas which, having a seat of their own, are not out of harmony with the old. The erratic so-called "new art" of realism has not disturbed the traditions.

All this may not interest the reader for news, but it is vastly interesting to the artists and the many who follow school work. Chicago is rich in excellent schools for design, illustration and the arts for commerce, as well as the academic course with its cultural studies. The school of the Art Institute, leading in the latter, has always to combat the inertia of the conservative scholar who fails to realize the need of energy to keep abreast of the times and to make use of the new point of view. Under Raymond P. Ensign, dean, the forward-looking method has been in the lead, and while there is nothing spectacular in the nine galleries, including the excellent Art Students' League annual exhibit, there is a revelation of the zest of a spontaneous practice of a trained technique in order to express a message within the scope of the fine arts.

Fortune has opened its doors to sculptors in a way that local studios everywhere can understand. For a decade and longer Chicago has been building palatial movie houses. Sculptural decorations have beautified interiors and exteriors. Certain parts of the scheme have come under union labor of the building trades but other sculpture has been purchased at the studio works where there are stock patterns of fountains, nymphs and the like. Thus while work has at hand and sculptors idle, builders followed old-fashioned methods.

Sculpture for a Theater. However, the Midway Studios are rejecting that an enlightened architect saw the value of original work in carrying out a magnificent effect in an adaptation of French Gothic in the two wings of a vast screen spreading from each side of the stage along the auditorium, having the great loft and exits a main corridor in its plan. The Paradise Theater to open in the fall is to use about 120 original decorative figures designed and modeled by Chicago sculptors. Miss Nellie V. Walker, Sidney Bedore and Fred M. Torrey are modeling nymphs, fauns, gods, deities, sprites, some larger than life others tiny as, for example, a faun playing his woodland pipes in a nook of the decorative plan.

Opportunity to work out one's ideas is inspiring. The Midway Studios are lively with industry while the great loft is in Florence. It means brist work to get this commission done in time. Meanwhile the demand upon sculptors for architectural decoration is increasing. John Paulding, Alfonso Iannelli, Leon Hermant and Emil Zettler of our local group have met the demands for sculpture in larger cities.

The Painter-Engravers of Hungary touring under the auspices of the Hungarian Legation at Washington and the Cleveland School of Art have drawn out a new group of viewers, the countrymen of the artists, to the Art Institute. So distinctive are the styles of the print makers that with the treatment of architecture half Eastern and half Western, where Budapest sets a dome of Stamboul on the foundations copied from the Houses of Parliament on the Thames to be mirrored in the Danube, where landscape and figure and the passionate themes of religion and labor breathe the native Hungarian spirit, the very atmosphere of an artistic race is conveyed to our galleries.

J. François Simon of Prague—a native Bohemian who has lived much in Paris and travels extensively, presents what a polished cosmopolitan can execute in etchings and prints with color. His exhibition at Roulier's repeats the pictured gaieties of Parisian markets and streets, of the artist in France when the snow lies whitely on the roofs of buildings whose gables and towers draw lines upon the gray skies. T. François Simon never disappoints as he always elates by means of an assured gift for drawing what is as picturesque as it is pleasing. His figures are true and human.

In this same print world is the stirring news that some eight of the Paris set by Charles Meryon which were to be sold to create the John H. Wrenn Memorial Fund for the print rooms of the Art Institute, have been taken by a well-known private collector near Chicago who is making his own portfolio. The John H. Wrenn Memorial Fund is to reach $25,000, dedicated to the uses of the print rooms for purchases of prints needed to complete sets or new works desired by the Art Institute. It consisted of the Meryons and other prints. As the Art Institute owned Meryons, it was at liberty to sell those left by Mr. Wrenn. The eight realized $7350, while there remains five valuable subjects whose duplicates are owned by the collector.

British Columbia Musical Festival

VANCOUVER, B. C., June 10 (Special Correspondence).—The fourth annual British Columbia musical competition festival, under the auspices of the Knights of Pythias, was brought to a close here recently at a gathering attended by more than 7000 music lovers. John Oliver, Premier of the Province, acted as chairman and presented the prizes. The feature of the closing program consisted of competitions for large male voice choirs and gold medalists in the instrumental class of last year's festival. In the first event the honors went to the Vancouver Men's Musical Club and second place was won by the Vancouver Welsh Choir. The instrumental solo championship gold medal, donated by the Hudson's Bay Company, was awarded to Edda Crittenden, violinist, for what was declared to be the most artistic contribution to the festival. Eileen Robertson, pianist, took second place.

Recitals in London

Special from Monitor Bureau

SELDOM have concert givers found themselves in a more perplexing situation than those artists who, having arranged fixtures for May, were suddenly confronted with the general strike. If they carried through their concerts as arranged, the probabilities were that half the audience would be absent from the stoppage of transport; if they postponed their concerts, the other half of the audience could not be informed, owing to the absence of newspapers. The majority decided on postponement; a few held steadily to first purposes.

Left Poulshoff courageously carried through his week of Chopin; Murray Lambert, a young violinist who has studied under Editha Knocker and Professor Auer, pluckily kept faith with her public. Her program was short of one promised novelty by the nonarrival of Dr. Ernest Walker and his new manuscript, "Variations on a Theme of Joachim for Violin and Piano." These qualifications were proved up to the hilt in Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," but this work requires the supple style and rhythmic finesse of Spanish phrasing.

Ruth Breton

By an interesting coincidence, another Auer pupil, Ruth Breton, played the same Concerto a week or two later at her violin recital in Wigmore Hall. She, too, has a warm (though less varied) tone; her technique is strong, almost infallible. Yet neither she nor Miss Lambert entered into the purely Spanish aspects of the work. Miss Breton indeed might have been interpreting Tchaikovsky. Vitali's Chaconne, a Sonata in D major by Vivaldi (arranged by Respighi), some virtuosic pieces were component parts of her well-made program, but its outstanding feature was the quiet, very original and poetic solo by Vaughan Williams named "The Lark Ascending." Here the rhapsodic arpeggios and trills slip naturally into the composer's scheme, registering a poet's impressions in terms of music. There are few modern solos which combine more happily an independent musical value with legitimate virtuoso work. Ruth Breton played it with a certainty of technique and with a genuine feeling for beauty that placed her definitely among artists to be heard again.

Another interesting, lovely and little-known work was brought forward by William Primrose at the Westminster Orchestral Society's concert in Queen's Hall. This was the concerto in B flat No. 1 by Mozart. Though not so large a work as the later concertos, it is pure Mozart, and the slow movement is quite enchanting.

Orloff and Rosenthal

Among recent pianoforte recitals those by Orloff and Rosenthal took prominent places. Orloff is at the threshold of what promises to be a notable career; Rosenthal has long occupied a position in the front rank of exponents. Orloff comes new to his work and keeps wonderfully fresh; Rosenthal has grown so accustomed to interpreting his programs on lines long settled that one suspects the music interested him less than it did. His performance of Beethoven's Sonata in C minor, Op. 111, certainly induced this impression, and the same can be said of the opening movements of Chopin's Sonata in B minor, though with the slow movement a spring of impulse seemed again to be released. "Ah, now he is really playing," one said to oneself.

Orloff devoted his recital entirely to Chopin. A selection of the shorter works, including some of the preludes, the Ballade in A flat, the Scherzo in C sharp minor, the Barcarolle and four Etudes, preceded and followed the Sonata in B flat minor which was in every sense the center of gravity in the program. The young Russian played it with a detached intensity that lifted the Sonata beyond the personal into something symbolic. It was as if he related the drama of a race. Each movement came as an inevitable sequel to the last, and the famous March gained strangely in power by his deliberate suppression of its historic aspects. Drained of color, the tone was cold, the rhythm as monotonously impressive as the plains of Russia. Not all the other works on his program were equally successful. But whatever Orloff plays, he has certain constant qualities that stand both himself and his audience in good stead: his tone, beautiful through all gradations, produces in cantabile an illusion of perfect sostenuto; and—he thinks interestingly. ## A Model and Its Makers

Nickol Meets Master Shakespeare

By MILICENT TAYLOR

"WHAT do ye lack? What do ye lack?" bawled the apprentices to the buyers at the street stalls along Cheapside; and the showman, opening the curtain of his little marionette theater, cried, "Stay, gentlemen all, and see our show!"

"Oh, I must view the puppets," exclaimed Nicholas, joining the crowd around the puppet show.

"And I the shops," said Roger, so impressed with the apprenticeship bond he had just signed that he must linger near his morrow's place of business.

Nicholas watched Punch and Judy, laughing with the crowd. A puppet show, traveling players, or a stage, ever held him beyond all else. What a wonderful first day he and Roger were having in London! Their Warwickshire village seemed far away. Surely in this splendid city he would find fortune, even as Roger.

"Clubs! Clubs!" was the shout passed along the street, and Nicholas was swept into a fight, against whom and for what cause he knew not. In the midst of the thrashing and shouting Roger pressed into his hand a staff.

"Strike for the cause of apprentices!"

"But I be none," laughed Nicholas, whacking about his head from being hit. Then, above the confusion, the bells of London and Westminster began to ring. The Lord Mayor's guards came riding along to clear the way. Of a sudden the fight was over; boys picked themselves out of the mud. People leaning out of overhanging upper windows hurled fireworks into the street. The showman hurriedly wheeled his striped puppet stage under a tavern doorway.

"Didst hear, Nicholas?" shouted Roger. "Queen Bess is to pass by in her coach." The boys nudged along to a vantage place. "See? Here they come!"

Queen Bess

A blaze of color advanced toward them. Elizabeth's yeomen of the guard in their long-skirted coats, white ruffs, and flat broad hats passed first, like a moving forest, and then the mounted horsemen. Next, Nicholas caught sight of the decorated royal coach with two others, and almost surrounded by dazzling courtiers on festive steeds. As it rolled toward him, the boy stood entranced to see the great ladies sliding within, partly curtained from view by velvet hangings.

So absorbed was the country lad by the brave show that he noticed not that all women folk around were courtesying low and men folk doing their hats. Suddenly his cap was snatched from his head and pressed into his hands.

"Of a truth, Ben, 'A lion among ladies is a most dreadful thing,' spake a low voice full of amusement. 'Salute thy Queen, lad, or be 't'en for a Spanish spy and crammed into the Tower as hero of thine own tragedy!'"

Nicholas saluted in confusion, and the Queen passed by.

"Clubs! Clubs!" was cried again, and the whacking of quarter staves split the crackling of fireworks, the shouts of shop vendors, and the booming of the great bell of Bow. But Nicholas pushed after the two strangers, one, a big heavy fellow with rough hands, the other, of the unforgettable voice, slighter in build and graceful in bearing.

"Who be they? I must know!" the boy exclaimed. A serious-faced man in a broad hat and flat collar turned upon him.

"Be not led astray, my boy. Avoid yonder strangers. Both the bricklayer and his companion be actors—the lesser one, Will Shakespeare. Shamefully worldly their entertainment, and the playhouses where they tread the boards."

Nicholas thanked the Puritan and stood gazing until the two strangers had disappeared. The bells ceased. The thrashing of staves lessened and stopped.

The Puppet Show

"Stay, gentlemen all, and see our show," cried the puppet master, wheeling out his little striped theater and opening the curtain. The crowd gathered around him. Shopkeepers were picking up their overturned wares, hustling their apprentices. Nicholas sought out Roger, who was aiding two friendly lads.

"I have seen Master Will of Stratford," he said eagerly. "And I cannot forget. Somewhat I must find to do where he treads the boards."

"But they say his playhouse be across on Bankside, without the walls," Roger objected. "One goeth over London Bridge or hireth a wherry for rowing upriver. I shall never see thee so far."

"Nevertheless, there lieth my fortune; that much I know," Nicholas replied, and added shyly, "Thou'lt come over mayhap some day to see thy friend Nickol himself treading the boards as a player. Who knows?"

"What do ye lack? What do ye lack?" began again up and down Cheapside. But Nicholas said farewell to Roger, stopped for his bundle at the inn where the two had stayed the night, and was soon trudging across the ancient bridge lined with little shops on his way to the Globe Playhouse.

Picking his path along the muddy streets of the little town of Southwark, the boy passed the Hope and came to the Globe. At he looked up at the high octagonal structure, he was content at the step he had taken. Surely he would find work hereabouts.

Entering the narrow door, he stood in the pit, unperceived and open to the twilight sky, and gazed around wonderingly at the triple tiered balcony. The place, except for a boy gathering rubbish, and two men perched on the edge of the huge stage that jutted out into the pit, was empty. Nicholas approached the men and jerked off his cap.

"If you please, sir," he began, "I seek work here. Be there need of an actor? I have played in village pieces at home. Or I would work at such, like yonder lad."

One of the men glanced at him curiously. As the theater was in dusk and all faces in shadow, Nicholas was astonished when he heard the voice of the morning.

"Nothing within at the present, boy. Yet the players come and go. Didst try the Hope, the Fortune, or the Swan?"

"Thank ye, Master Shakespeare, but I would rather wait chance at the Globe," replied the boy. At this the man leaned toward him, and Nicholas saw the pointed beard and deep-thinking eyes.

"Bless me, if it be not the Spanish spy—and a Warwickshire flavor to his speech or I be not of Stratford on Avon!—Here," and he took from his pouch a roll of papers and while continuing, chose and wrote on one, "if thou hadst sought to please thee at the playhouses, go to Diknon the saddler, round about here—folk will tell thee. Give him this note and ask for a place as horseboy outside our Globe. 'Tis a fair work, as I well know, and will keep thee in what thou canst crop a place within. What is thy name?"

"Nicholas Dale, of Peabworth, sir, at thy service."

"Good fortune to thee, then, Nickol of Warwickshire," Master Shakespeare replied with a sweeping bow and a laugh; and Nicholas, thanking him, went forth.

At the Globe Theater

With no players needed at the Hope near by, Nicholas made use of Master Will's note and next day was holding horses by the door when the flag went up on the Globe to tell all the play was on. That was the first of new days for him. He came to know the great octagon of London. He was joked by the actors as they passed to and fro. In the taverns where he went he joined in talk of plays and player folk. At times, too, he gave his sixpence and made place in the rough crowd standing in the pit. At these times he knew that of all the plays men liked, he himself loved best those fashioned by Master William Shakespeare. Parts of these he learned by heart from a friend he had made in the company, and while tending the horses outside he would recite the lines and imagine the scenes that were being acted on the stage within.

Thus four months passed.

One bright morning Nicholas was showing his friend Roger, the apprentice, all through the Globe, inside and out. They had climbed to the balconies where the seats for gentlefolk were. They had mounted to the tower where the flag flew, and looked out over the fields to the south and across the river on the north at the winding streets of London Town and Westminster from Ludgate to the Abbey. They had paused on the gallery above the stage, from which Jessica looked down and Juliet called into the garden. They had examined pieces of scenery—the trees for Arden Forest, the throne for Hamlet's room. Then they emerged upon the stage.

"I know 'The Merchant' best of all thy plays,"

"Good, then, thou art engaged. The boy who played Portia this day left me, so Philip Mercer is shifted to his place. Thou shalt do his Nerissa. Ho, Ben!" he called, and the great bricklayer-actor, Ben Jonson, strode into view. "Ben, these be a Warwickshire lad and his friend, Nickol, here, by afternoon is become an actor. Think ye not that the occasion merits a portion of venison pie and an hour or two at the Mermaid? Then mayhap," he added, turning to Roger, "thou wilt be pleased with the best of gull's seats on the corner of the stage, while thy young friend, having known such inventions as 'phone and telegraph are unknown."

"Laugh an thou wilt; but I know parts now and shall be ready," Nicholas retorted gayly. "I can say speeches of Hamlet and of Prince Henry as well as Mark Antony. I can take thee into Caesar's time." As if to prove his point Nicholas began with, "Friends, Romans," and so created the scene that Roger stood awestruck, forgetting it was only his old friend Nicholas Dale. "See?" the boy laughed. "I know that and more. Such lines, Roger! Be they not unsurpassed? But here is a part from 'Midsummer Night's'—this will make thee merry." Of a sudden he was doing Bottom as Pyramus, with a most comic air.

A soft chuckle from the empty pit arrested them. Nicholas gave one look and would have fled.

"Nay, hold, lad! 'Twas well enough," Master Shakespeare came forward. "Thy voice is still light. Canst do women's parts, Nickol? Dost know the words of Nerissa in 'The Merchant'?"

"Yea, sir, I think me every word. I know 'The Merchant' best of all thy plays."

A Successful Four-H Club

Eugene, Ore.

LANE COUNTY division of the boys and girls of the Four-H National Club, which was organized here some 10 years ago for the purpose of helping the young generation to be good and useful citizens, has grown so extensively during the past year that its enrollment is now 1000 members. This is due, according to Arnold D. Collier, club leader, to the work and its accomplishments. The members realize what can be learned from taking project work in the club, and they have exploited the work among their friends.

The Four-H club in this county, like the others of the State, is sponsored by the United States Department of Agriculture and the Department of Education in co-operation with the Oregon Agricultural College.

During the present year, which runs from fair time in the fall until the following year, several pioneer projects have been added to the Lane County Club work program. One is the calf club project, in which the county last enrolled for a term of at least four months. In this work the student keeps complete records of his own calf, including breed, weight, appearance, time of feeding, improvements and other details. At the end of the four months' period the county leader makes a check of the boy's work and grades the report accordingly.

Sewing, Canning and Cooking

Sewing, canning and cooking clubs have been organized for girls and boys alike to teach them the needle and culinary arts. A student in these courses is given as much time as needed in which to complete the lessons designated.

In this work as well as in others, a student very seldom does only what is required. Mr. Collier stated. In almost all cases the boy or girl undertakes at least twice the amount of work designated and sometimes more.

Farm accounting is a pioneer project which is gaining a great deal of headway in this division. Each bank of the county has adopted one who keeps his father's farm accounts. He does the bookkeeping under the supervision of his foster bank, and keeps all accounts regarding the care of the farm and household. At present there are 11 such banks in the community which have adopted a boy and girl teaching him the foundation of organized farming and good citizenship.

There is also a farm mechanic project, which is another step toward advancement of the local organization. This work has an enrollment of 23 boys from several different communities, who hold evening meetings in Mr. Collier's office. This course teaches rope splicing and knot tying; farm tools, and the working and care of these; soldering, plumbing and gatemaking.

The work is carried on by the boys and girls themselves, though the County Club leader personally supervises and makes corrections when necessary. "In letting the boy or girl look to himself for an answer to the county leader makes a check of the work designed and sometimes more."

Throughout the year each and every member of the club is looking forward to fair time and is working to bring his project, whether it be pig, calf, sheep, sewn article, cooked food or canned vegetable, to the point of supremacy where it will be in line for first prize.

Then, when fair time comes, each member makes his or her entries and awaits the decision of the judges. The primary purpose of this display at the fair is to show each member of the club and others just what each one has done during the past year. Mr. Collier explained.

Also the best entries entered in the Oregon State Fair held annually in Salem, Ore.

Lane County winners in this state fair, and during the past two years there have been several, are then entered in the various live-stock exhibitions of the Northwest or in the International Pacific Livestock Exposition which is held in Portland annually.

Moreover, a winner in the county fair is eligible to attend a two-weeks schooling or summer session at the Oregon Agricultural College.

which is promoted especially for boy and girl club members. The courses offered range from stock judging and raising to courses in needlecraft, cookery and agricultural work.

As a termination of the year's work a booklet is published by the State Department of Education in which pictures and excerpts of letters written by the winners are printed. The purpose of this is to stimulate interest among the members, and since he conducted himself in so seemingly a manner, that he will be invited to go soon again. Indeed, his master said the other day that when spring came on he intended to take Honey-bear along with him every time he drove out in his car.

Anyone interested in finding out more about Honey-bear's little relatives in the jungle will find their things recorded in the books under the name Kinkajou.

Who was he?

He was a tall man, with a serious, strong face, who lived in the Florence of the fifteenth century.

He was a painter, one of the greatest in the long history of art, and a very great man as well. He was accomplished and learned in the technique of his art; he knew how to mix his colors so that his pictures are today as fresh and vivid as they were when he painted them a thousand years ago; he knew how to secure perspective in a picture; how to model bodies; how to place all the parts of a picture, the horizontal and the vertical, so that all fit together to make a unified whole like the notes in a song. His colors are like those of jewels, glowing and rich; his lines are graceful and clear; and he places them in such relation to one another that when we look at them, in his famous frescoes of the Virgin, we marvel at the great beauty which he has achieved.

He was free from all self-seeking. He might have made a huge fortune, but he was a simple and unassuming man, and he was devoted to the great spiritual realities than has any other painter.

His life, like that of another great Florentine, Dante, is a story of struggle. The first comprises a childhood in the country and an early manhood which he devoted to learning how to paint and to quiet meditation upon the true meaning of life. In the second part he expressed what was in him in the manner of which he had become a master. During those years he made San Marco, which was then a cloister and is now a national museum, a wonder of beauty.

WHO WAS HE?

But, though he prefers to sleep all day at night, Honey-bear comes into his own, for it is then that he sees his best. He goes out for his constitutional every night with his master, and follows on a leash as obediently as a well-ordered collie.

Honey-bear has a long, very slender body, well adapted for squeezing honey out of its hidden store-houses, and they do say that the little chaps in their native haunts in Central and South America make a very big noise at meal time and can be heard at long distances enjoying their dinner because of this sucking process.

Besides honey our little Honey-bear relishes fruit and he has a good healthy appetite, easily eating a dozen bananas in a day—six at a meal—together with other fruits and jellies.

His mother is very fond of him and, indeed, anyone could become attached to such pets as they are easily

The Hubbard Medal

LEUT.-COM. BYRD, the first explorer to reach the North Pole by air, is to receive a well-deserved tribute. He is to be awarded the famous Hubbard medal by the National Geographic Society. This medal was awarded to Robert E. Peary, discoverer of the North Pole, in 1906, to Sir Ernest Shackleton, antarctic explorer, in 1910, to Maj.-Gen. George Goethals, constructor of the Panama Canal, in 1914, and to Vilhjalmur Stefansson, discoverer of the South Pole in 1919.

Lieut.-Com. Byrd is eager for more polar exploration. He feels the lure of the great unknown ice regions of the world, and hopes to devote the next 10 years to the hardship, toil and adventure which are the lot of the explorer. Next year he hopes to try a flight to the South Pole. Incidentally, he and his pilot, Floyd Bennett, intend to fly the Josephine Ford to the Sesquiennial Exposition at Philadelphia.

A Cherokee Indian Girl

Another award of great interest has recently been made to a Cherokee Indian girl, Ruth Muskrat, who graduated from Mount Holyoke College last June. This is the prize of $1000 offered by Henry Morgenthau to the graduate of the class of 1925, who should do the most to pass on to others the benefit of her own education. Some of you may already have read the interesting account of Miss Muskrat's career given in the Monitor.

When Miss Muskrat entered Mount Holyoke College, coming with junior rank from the University of Kansas, and the University of Oklahoma, she had already shown her deep-seated desire to help her own people. She had made speeches on their behalf in Iowa, Colorado, Missouri, Ohio and New York, and in April, 1922, she was sent as a delegate of the American Indian students to the conference of the World's Students' Federation in Peking, being the first American Indian ever present at a world conference.

On leaving college last year, Miss Muskrat spent the summer as dean of women at the Northeastern State Teachers' College of Oklahoma, where she did valuable work. She then accepted a position of the teaching staff of Haskell Institute, the largest school for Indians in the United States, but before joining the institute she spent a few weeks among the Ponca Indians in a little reservation just outside Ponca City, Okla.

Here she set to work to organize better recreation for the Indian girls. "There was absolutely no recreation left for them to do but trail after nomadic parents from Indian dance to Indian dance the whole summer long," she said. So Miss Muskrat began to make new and interesting kinds of social gatherings—picnics, sewing parties, evening parties on the mission lawn when she would read to them. She tried to show them how to plan things, how to overcome the terrible ennui under which they were sunk.

Since last September, Miss Muskrat has been at the Haskell Institute. Here she has given herself up to the task of helping on what she feels she has gained. Her great ambition is to send another girl to take her place at Mount Holyoke College.

Great Britain's Coal Dispute

The coal problem of Great Britain still remains to be solved. The Prime Minister has declared in the House of Commons that the Government has come quite definitely to the conclusion that longer working hours are necessary in the mines. At present the miners work seven hours a day. Although much coal is being sent into the country from abroad, reports are now reaching London that certain industries are suffering seriously from the coal shortage. This is especially true of the Lancashire cotton trade. The spinning mills concerned in American cotton are all working half-time, and many smaller concerns are closed. For this reason, and because it does not seem that the two parties in the dispute are likely to come together of their own accord, great pressure is being brought to bear on the Government to take action.

At Geneva

Since the League of Nations made Geneva its headquarters it has become a world center for meetings and conferences. The number of international meetings, international courses and international visits will be greater than ever this year. This summer there are to be nine university and other courses, and five international meetings, quite apart from the conferences of the League.

My Roof-Aerie

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Up on the roof by a chimney-pot Where the wind blows cool and the sun shines hot, Aloof from the streets where the cars clang by, Where the people pass and the hucksters cry, High from the city, close to the sky I sit me down with a book.

Far to the east shines the bright blue bay Luring the town to a holiday— To a blazing beach and a screaming din Of bands and voices shrill and thin. Far to the north lies the great estate— Lawns, and trees, and iron gates. Wealth, and squalor. For me there waits My chimney-pot and my book.

The Suspended Knife Trick

You pick up a knife, rub it briskly on the palm of the hand, and then suspend it from the finger tips, or from the palm of the hand in a very mysterious manner.

The secret is to make a weak solution of water and secotine, which is applied to the palm and finger and allowed to dry. This solution is sticky enough to cause the knife to stay in any prescribed position.

EDUCATIONAL

Salvaging Committee in the High School

SALVAGING of the human material which is brought to the modern educational gristmill is of primary importance. One of the most deplorable wastes in the high-school grades is the dropping out of the boys and girls during the first or second year. From lack of any compelling interest in their work and with insufficient preparation to enable them to advance, these boys and girls drift aimlessly from job to job in the blind-alley occupations and help to swell the ranks of unskilled labor. In a large measure this is due to the non-adjustment of the pupil to his course of study. There are several pertinent causes for this condition, especially in our city schools. First among these is the ignorance of the intent of the courses of study on the part of the parents and their consequent indifference to the importance of putting the boy or girl into that course for which his aptitudes most fit him; the second cause is the emphasis put upon the program rather than the individual pupil by principals and submasters, due in part to crowded conditions or pride in the smooth running of the machine. The third reason is the lack of an adequate advisory system by which parents and pupils may be made acquainted with the nature of the courses and through co-operative consultation and proper understanding of the child's fitness, guide him into the right studies.

In a certain city an attempt has been made to obviate these difficulties. An advisory committee was formed, one of the duties of which was to meet and confer with each incoming pupil, and if possible his parents, both in the spring and in the fall when the course cards had to be made out in order to fit into the program. The committee was divided up into other subcommittees which included in their personnel all of the progressive and specialized members of the faculty, those who had a human perspective broad enough to enable them to understand the vital issues of the work they were to undertake in their relations to the boy or girl's environment, and those who had a bent. The members of the committee were drawn from all departments of the high school: commercial, college preparatory, and general.

Committee Work
The work of the committee consisted in interviewing the parents either in the home or at the school, tactfully arousing them to the importance of the choice of courses to be made, and finding out important data regarding the children, and then conferring with the boy or girl individually. The incoming class of the year was of some 400, and the task was a prodigious one. The problem that confronted the committee was not one wholly of parents and children; they had also to avoid in any way antagonizing the more conservative elements in the public and the school board, and refrain from adding to the problems of the principal in his annual struggle to find a place for each of his complicated classes. Incompatibility between teacher and pupil was admitted as a factor, but to readjust this difficulty might prove a dangerous innovation in pedagogical tradition. Another problem to be faced was in the laxness of parents, who, in this world's affairs, was troubled that what had been good enough for her and her older children was now suddenly considered inadequate for the younger.

Unblinded by these rocks in their pathway, the committee began their work. Boys and girls in the upper classes were permitted to choose their advisers among the faculty instead of being assigned to certain teachers as had hitherto been the custom. Each pupil sent in three choices and was assigned to that one whose quota had not been filled. Each year they were permitted this selection of the one who was to be their friend and counselor.

Afternoon after afternoon and during spare periods in the school sessions the committee worked in constant co-operation with the principal and sub-masters, getting at the preferences and aptitudes of the many applicants. This work being done in part prior to the summer vacation and also in the first few days of the fall session.

Testing of the Plan
At the beginning of the next year began the testing of the efficacy of their plan. A special committee of five was chosen to carry into effect the most vital part of their work, that of readjustment. The faculty were asked to co-operate by sending in reports of misfits or failures among the pupils at the end of the first 15 weeks. The pupils were informed by the chairman of the committee that the nature of their work was not to censor but to co-operate and help, with the promise of an absolutely impartial and honest treatment of all their grievances. An office had been secured in the building and time during the session was given to each member of the committee in which to confer with teachers and pupils.

In one instance the writer was faced one morning by an irate and obdurate young freshman who had been sent to her by his teacher with the statement that unless his entire attitude toward his work changed, another failure at the end of the next marked season was inevitable. Upon questioning the boy, the adviser found that it was a case of stubborn defiance of what he considered the teacher's impertinent method of asking him questions before the class. He admitted, upon repeating the nature of the questions that they were logical, but still insisted that their manner of presentation was offensive, and he wished to be put immediately into another class. Beneath this desire was discovered by tactful questions, a preconceived prejudice against the teacher and a determination on his part to "show her a few things." The unreasonableness of this attitude forced home an honest acknowledgment of his fault made. A genuine apology, the establishment of a better understanding between pupil and teacher, and a mark second to the highest in the class at the end of the next mark period, were the outcome of this conference.

One other instance will illustrate the work of this committee. A teacher had found a boy dull and unresponsive in the classroom, and had challenged him one morning as to what he was doing with his pencil all the time. Much embarrassed he had delivered the pad to her. It was covered with very characteristic postures and facial expressions of his teacher, recognizable by the instructor herself. Brought before the committee, it revealed the fact that the boy was in the classical course when by every inclination he was suited for the commercial art course. The change was magnetic; from an indifferent and phlegmatic member of the school community he forged ahead and before his course was finished he was president of his class and the leading athlete of the school. Many such a lad has dropped unnoticed from his classes and gone undiscovered, reckoned a failure.

These few instances could be multiplied by many, each of significant and vital in its far-reaching effects upon the careers of our future citizens. During the first three years of its existence this committee adjusted hundreds of differences between pupils and teachers, refitted scores of boys and girls into their right places, changed the current of many a life from certain failure to success, and proved to the faculty and the parents that a stitch in time saves nine. They demonstrated that it is possible and wholly compatible with the dignity of the teaching process to recognize inherent incompatibilities between teachers and pupils, and to readjust the difficulties without destroying the smooth and harmonious working of the school machinery. Such a committee can be made a salvaging activity in any school where it is wisely and sympathetically operated.

At School in Valley of the Moon

San Francisco, Calif.
Staff Correspondence
THE Indians in Sonoma County, California, have found a friend in Miss Louise Clark, county superintendent of schools. In three years she has set a school in the wilderness, surrounded it with playgrounds and interested an entire tribe, the Kashias, in education. Calculated to fit them for useful work and the enjoyments of citizenship.

In this county, the Valley of the Moon, beloved of Jack London, there are 357 Indians living on five reservations. Of these the Kashias number 101, with 35 living on the reservation, which is just east of Stewart's Point on 37 acres of uncleared land. Three years ago when Miss Clark assumed the duties of her office the school nearest to the reservation was five miles over the mountains, but was attended by only the older Indian children. After considerable search she succeeded in finding, encamped along the road and picking up prunes, the "key man" of the Kashias. Through him the Indians agreed to stay on the reservation eight months each year and take advantage of school privileges.

"No county, state or federal aid can be secured to build a school house, but the Federal Government promised to pay 60 cents per day per pupil at the end of every quarter."

All school buildings have been whitewashed, the ground cleared for playground, baseball, basketball and gardens. A neglected orchard is receiving care, the land plowed and cultivated with the teachers' implements, and all has a bright aspect.

"The Indians have been true to their promise. We have had more than the required eight months of schooling, and the children not only come the five days in the week, but return for extra work on Saturday."

"And the Indian children? Clean and lovable, they have been filled with delight by their first balls, a victrola and Christmas things. Some who have never been in school are today doing fifth grade work after two years of teaching. One girl 12 years of age has passed the standard tests in fourth grade arithmetic, sixth grade reading and eighth grade spelling."

"Through the kindness of friends in the wholesale grocery business in San Francisco food supplies are purchased at wholesale prices. Thus many more can be helped with the federal money. The idea of this venture of public school education in the wilderness is not to pauperize but to help these people to become useful citizens."

Friends of the Indians in California are active in support of a bill now pending in Congress which would repay to the Indians 50 cents per acre for lands taken from them illegally.

"Marking Time" in the Upper Classes

London, Eng.
Special Correspondence

THE president of the Board of Education threw a large pebble into the waters when he criticized the work in the upper classes of the elementary schools a few months ago; and the educational pool is still ruffled. "I do not think," said Lord Eustace Percy, "that generally speaking for general cultural purposes, we are now giving any education in the vast majority of our elementary schools after the age of 12 which it is really worth while for any child to stay at school to get, and when you have said that, you have leveled a criticism and a charge against the elementary schools of this country which it is vitally important that all should work together to wipe out as soon as possible."

Of this, two things can be said at the outset. In the first place, the indictment is too far-reaching—as Lord Eustace Percy has himself admitted. The education most children are receiving after the age of 12 is not standing still. They are not, and this is the second observation that must be made, teachers and administrators are and have long been of the opinion that the best is not being done that could be done for the last three years of the pupils' school lives. The reason for this is, in part, financial. More teachers are needed in order to reduce the average size of the classes; more and separate classroom accommodation is required, and a need exists for greater provision for practical work in arts, crafts and natural science. All these requirements are being held up on the ground of expense.

Attacking the Problem

But despite this financial handicap educational enthusiasts are by no means standing still. They are throwing their energies into finding the best solution possible in the existing circumstances. And this is being done in two ways, one of which depends on the administrator and the other on the teacher. The administrator is doing his best to reorganize schools so that the older children can be taken from very small schools and concentrated in centrally situated schools, where the larger numbers render possible and economical the provision of a good staff and equipment, while the teacher is endeavoring, by the application of individual methods, to develop each child's capabilities to the full.

Both methods of approach are worthy of consideration, an example of the first may be given. In a certain area there were three villages, with a school, near to a small town, containing two schools. The local authority reorganized this group so that one of the two town schools was converted into a junior department and the other into a senior department. The older children from the three village schools were transferred to the new senior department; and the number of pupils between 11 and 14 years of age thus brought under one roof was sufficient to warrant the appointment of well qualified teachers, and the building of a practical workshop, a domestic subjects center, and a room for practical science. A school garden and a playing field were also added. The older pupils were thus provided with facilities which would have been impossible when they were scattered in small numbers in the five schools.

The reform in teaching which has recently taken place consists in the adoption of the Dalton plan, or some other method of individual work. Though some may proceed slowly, others are making rapid strides; and there is a total absence of "marking time."

The Self-Contained School

At the same time, as a natural reaction against the idea that small schools should be amalgamated to produce a fair-sized school, there is being stressed the argument that the self-contained unit, with pupils of all grades of ability and attainment grouped together, is a more accurate reflex of the conditions of actual life. Especially is this argument being pressed against the practice which is growing in some areas of segregating the more backward of the older children from the advanced—either in separate schools or in separate classes in the same school. The argument is put forth that, after all, only a limited number desire preparation for professions or are capable of the intellectual work involved, or are capable of gaining fullest advantage from an advanced type of academic training; while the vast majority require a secondary education which is a more accurate preparation for the occupations of average citizens who earn their wages in commerce and industry. Repetition and routine work is not creative or educative in itself. The self-contained school, say

SOME STOCKS REACH RECORD HIGH LEVELS

U. S. Steel, General Motors, General Electric at New Top Prices

By the Associated Press
NEW YORK, June 17.—Responding to easier money rates and favorable trade reports, stock prices bounded upward 1 to 12 points in today's stock market.

Both the rails and industrials participated in the advance with heavy buying reported from both long and short traders.

Total sales averaged more than 500,000 shares an hour in the first three hours of trading. Steel common and General Motors led the advance, touching their highest prices in history at 139 1/2 and 147 1/2, respectively. Dozens of other issues also eclipsed previous high prices for the year, the list including Panhandle Producers & Refiners, which touched 37, compared with low of 4 1/2 earlier in the year. Gotham Silk Hosiery, and General Electric new stock.

Rails were heavily bought on expectation of favorable rail legislation by Congress, and reports of large current earnings. Atlantic Coast Line led the group with an early gain of nearly 5 points, while Reading, Nickel Plate, Lackawanna and Louisville & Nashville, each advanced 2 points or more. Motors, rubbers, chemicals, coppers, equipments and steels also presented several points of strength, but the oils appeared rather sluggish after having rallied briskly earlier in the week.

Foreign exchanges were irregular at the opening, with dollar and sterling holding at $4.86 1/2, and French francs easing to 2.84 1/2 cents.

With speculative interest centered in the upward rise of stock prices, the bond market today merely held its ground in rather quiet trading. The continuance of easy money conditions gave a firm undercurrent to trading.

Major activity was confined to the foreign list, which was featured by an unexpected burst of strength in French issues. The Government's 8 and 7s both advanced about a point, and good support was extended to the railroad and municipal issues, including Paris-Lyon 7s and Bordeaux 6 1/2s. Revolving bonds for a solution of the French financial problems influenced by Belgium, Swiss and American bonds also were in demand.

In keeping with the trend of the stock market, the heavy display of buying interest elsewhere was seen in steel and miscellaneous industrial issues. Bethlehem Steel 6s repeated their previous high price, and the Missouri Pacific 6 1/2s, which had been firm, were recorded by Youngtown 6s, Central Leather 6s, International Paper 6s and American Writing Paper 6s. Oil listed heavy in contrast with the strength of these stocks, and Brooklyn Union Gas 5 1/2s declined on profit taking. Rock Island, Missouri Pacific and other southwestern rails were firm.

New bond issues aggregating more than $20,000,000 were readily absorbed. The Ohio Power Company was reported to be negotiating for the sale of a $10,000,000, 4 1/2 per cent bond issue.

DOMINION STORES SALES EXPANDING

For May sales of Dominion Stores Co. Ltd., of Canada, were $1,445,538, compared with $1,122,300 for May, 1925, an increase of $323,238, or 28.8 per cent. For the five months ending May 31, sales totaled $5,891,522, compared with corresponding period of 1925, an increase of $1,311,665, or 27.8 per cent.

During the first five months of the year, bringing total in operation to 41, compared with 37 at the end of May, 1925, Dominion Stores has increased its sales as reported by the old established stores, as well as additions to income from the new.

PENDULUM IS ISOLATED IN NOVEL CLOCK

Swing Control Light Beam Playing on Photo-Elec- tric Cell

Watches, without mainsprings, operated by radio waves were a development predicted as a reality of the future in a recent interview in The Christian Science Monitor. R. E. Gould, chief of the time section of

This apparatus does not actually pick radio waves or time signals out of the ether, but it does perform a wondrous feat of taking a time signal from a pendulum without mechanical contact with the latter. Seemingly, by means of a combination of a photoelectric cell and a radio amplifier, accurate time signals are produced. A beam of light falling upon the photoelectric cell is interrupted by the pendulum; the result is the light is chopped up and a time signal is yielded.

A 30-day movement clock; a 6-volt concentrated filament lamp of 100 candlepower; a photo-electric cell; a radio amplifying unit consisting of two vacuum tubes; a telegraph key; a chronograph drum with paper upon which to record signals automatically; a potentiometer; grid leaks; and batteries, are the necessary parts of this invention. "The object of this apparatus," explains Mr. Gould, "is to demonstrate a method to obtain regular time signals from a pendulum without actual mechanical contact."

The source of illumination, a filament lamp of 100 candle power, is connected by means of a transformer to the ordinary house or office electric lighting circuit. The lamp is mounted in a tiny house and it is provided with lens, thus enabling the proper focusing of the light upon the slot in the black surface containing the clock. The light from the lamp, the slit in the clock case, the end of the clock pendulum (at rest), and the window of the photo-electric cell must converge in the same straight line.

The 30-day-movement clock is equipped with a half-seconds' pendulum. To the end of the latter is placed a hard rubber tube, about three inches long and three-eighths inch in diameter. This rubber tube is sufficiently light to permit of the variation from the half second, due to its weight, to be converted by an adjustment of the pendulum bob. The back glass of the clock case is painted with lampblack with the exception of a tiny slit, about the width of the rubber tube on the end of the pendulum. As the latter swings back and forth, this rubber tube cuts off the light passing through this slit. By a careful level-

Time signals thus taken from a swinging pendulum, without mechanical contact, are accurate to approximately 1 part in 1000. "Doubtless a polarized ray," states the inventor, "would greatly increase the accuracy of the signal received. However, using a relay will probably limit the accuracy to approximately 1 part in 1000. Signals have been recorded on an oscillograph direct from the radio tubes, without any relay, and were found to be good to 1 part in 5000."

Up to the present no way out has been found for the deadlock which prevented the admission of Germany to the League of Nations at Geneva last March.

Brazil's Withdrawal From the League

stormy sessions of the League in March, but parted without agreement. The most promising proposal put forward seems to have been that of Viscount Cecil, who suggested that the permanent members on the Council should remain unaltered save for the addition of Germany, that the number of nonpermanent members should be raised from six to nine, of whom six should hold office for three years only and then retire by rotation, while three should have a rather longer though not a permanent tenure.

But even this plan, which seemed to show the way round the corner by keeping Brazil and Spain on the Council for a further period, though it did not give them the permanent seats they wanted, failed of acceptance. Shortly afterward it was announced that Brazil had withdrawn from the League altogether.

In these circumstances it would seem to be well worth while to give more consideration to an idea which has been put forward in several quarters in the last few months. It has been urged that the root difficulty for the League is that it is dominated by the European powers and is too preoccupied with European affairs. That was natural at the time the League was formed, for Europe was the theater of the World War and almost all nations were vitally interested in the result of the war being fought there. But Europe has now gone back to her place as but one of the continents. Moreover, her prestige in the world is not what it was. People recognize that that modern civilization of which Europe has been the chief parent and in the armaments, hatreds, feuds, and intrigues which precipitated the war and have delayed reconstruction since. Owing to internal divisions, too, her political and economic power in the world is much less than it used to be.

As a result, neither the states of North and South America nor of Asia are as willing as they might once have been to see a League of Nations monopolized or dominated by the European powers, or to have the problems of their own sections of the world subordinated to those of Europe. If, for instance, Europe protests, and not unreasonably protests, against the veto of a South American power being used to exclude Germany from the Council of the League and so to nullify the effect of the Locarno settlement, it is no less reasonable for the rest of the world to protest against world problems being brought before a Council composed of seven European states, four of them quite unimportant from the world standpoint, two South American powers, and one Asiatic.

Viewed from this standpoint the action of Brazil assumes a much greater significance. It is not only a protest against her not being given a permanent seat on the League, it is also a protest against the tendency of the European powers to subordinate the League's affairs to their own ideas and requirements. Accordingly, it has been suggested that a possible solution might be that the Council of the League should be differently constituted according to whether it is dealing with the internal affairs of Europe or with problems which are really of concern to the whole world. When it is considering world problems, it should be so composed as to give representation to the great world powers and also to all the great continents. When it is dealing with the internal affairs of Europe, it should be composed of European powers alone.

It certainly seems worth while to give this proposal consideration, if the deadlock continues. To prevent the entry of Germany into the League is not desirable from either the European or the American point of view. But equally it is futile to expect that the rest of the world should be willing to take their problems to Geneva for solution so long as the final authority there is a body which is almost wholly European in personnel and chosen mainly with regard to the political problems of Europe alone.

It was inevitable, of course, that the courts should be called upon to determine the finality of any verdict rendered by a purely voluntary jury of citizens which decreed the enforced suspension of a theatrical production found to be objectionable from the point of public morals. This is exactly what will result from the refusal of a New York theater manager to conform to the edict issued after a play jury had ordered off the stage, with the implied sanction of the Producing Managers' Association and the Actors' Equity Association, a production found by it to be offensive. It should be said, in justice to the Actors' Equity Association, which was in a position to act definitely in co-operation with the jury, that its members in the cast withdrew at once and refused to continue work, thus fulfilling their obligation to the public.

The legal test comes in the form of an order of court temporarily enjoining the District Attorney and the Actors' Equity Association from interfering with the production of the play. It will be made permanent unless cause can be shown why it should be dismissed. The proceeding serves to join and present a clear issue. Apparently there is no claim made that the production is not offensive and objectionable. The decision will turn, apparently, upon the right of those invested with the police power to delegate their authority to juries of citizens acting as semi-official censors of the stage. Incidentally there will be interposed the question as to the right of actors who are members of "Equity" to stop a production simply because a citizens' jury condemns it.

The complaint of the producers in this case, as in any case where a play is denounced as objectionable or immoral, is not because it is thus condemned, but because of the effectiveness of the method chosen to make further production impossible. Without the co-operation of the producing managers collectively, and of "Equity" in particular, the verdict of an unofficial citizens' jury would not carry much weight. Box-office receipts have been increased in the past, just as they no doubt will be in the future, as a result of publicity gained for objectionable plays through well-intentioned efforts to force them to suspend. But it seems this citizen-jury plan is carrying a good thing a little too far. The point of the joke is lost when the theater is forced to turn out its lights, just as it is when an officer of the law places a padlock on the door of brewery or illicit saloon.

The outcome of this test case will be watched with interest. One familiar with some questionable productions in New York and several other American cities within the last two or three years may feel justified in concluding that in those populous centers which attract daily vast numbers of buyers, travelers and pleasure-seekers, it is next to impossible to establish any effective form of individual censorship, either of stage or screen productions. In places where the financial success of such offerings depends upon the approval of the people of the town or city, such popular censorship is not only possible but effective. New York, most of all American cities, is in need of just such a weapon as that which has been devised, and the effectiveness or legality of which is now to be tested.

While it would be exceedingly difficult and rash to venture a positive forecast of political conditions in Great Britain, one fact can fairly be said to be outstanding—that whatever the future holds for the Liberal Party, Mr. Lloyd George will probably remain the center of activities which may at any moment change the whole balance of political parties there. Unquestionably, the Liberal Party, representing middle politics in Britain, halfway between the Conservative Right and the Liberal Left, is threatened with disintegration. When its titular and universally respected but somewhat slow-moving leader, Lord Oxford, who was popularly known when Prime Minister as "Watt and See," fell out with his progressive chief lieutenant, David Lloyd George, who was Coalition Prime Minister during the war and now leads the Liberals in the House of Commons, the party received a jar that was as severe a blow at its integrity as it has received in many years. Indeed, an open split became evident the other day when a majority of the Liberal members in the House of Commons voted to uphold Mr. Lloyd George.

The immediate cause of the breach between Lord Oxford and Mr. Lloyd George was, of course, the latter's attitude during the general strike, an attitude which Lord Oxford, in a published statement, characterized as calculated to "weaken the authority of the Government, which was for the moment the embodiment and organ of the national self-defense against the gravest domestic danger which has threatened the country in our time." Moreover, there was no question as to how Lord Oxford felt toward the main issue, for he said further that "Mr. Lloyd George . . . chose to separate himself in the most formal manner from our deliberations in a moment of great emergency. He was not driven out; he refused to come in."

Lord Oxford's chief supporters, indeed, including Lord Grey of Fallodon, Sir John Simon, Walter Runciman, Donald Maclean, Vivian Philpotts, Walter M. R. Pringle and Godfrey P. Collins, took an even stronger stand, for in a published letter to Lord Oxford they declare of Mr. Lloyd George that "confidential relations are impossible with one whose instability destroys confidence." Mr. Lloyd George's reply was moderate and conciliatory, and later he held a meeting of Liberal members of Parliament, among whom he still commands a majority, and secured an expression of opinion urging that unity should be preserved.

The breach is looked upon in Liberal circles, however, as too complete to be bridged. The Nation and Athenaeum, which supports Mr. Lloyd George, says truthfully that its origin is to be found in "general distrust of Mr. Lloyd George." The episode of the general strike was "the occasion of the breach, rather than the cause." The fact is, Mr. Lloyd George differs from Lord Oxford fundamentally in that he sees that the future of Liberalism is on the Left, since combined Liberal and Labor votes at the last election would, if united, have outweighed those cast for the Government.

His policy is, therefore, to secure co-operation with Labor. To this end he has refused to place the large political funds he has accumulated—stated to be about £1,000,000—at the disposal of the Liberal Party as a whole. He retains them in his own hands and those of his personal supporters, for furtherance of the objects he has in view. He has issued a disclaimer in which he denies "the foolish story that I have been seeking a pretext for joining another party." J. Ramsay MacDonald, leader of the Labor Party, has also formally denied this report, while the New Leader, representing the advanced Labor wing, pours scorn upon Socialists who "want to swap leaders with the Liberals."

The fact is, the proposal finds favor at present neither with Socialist Labor, which still hopes some day to rule a world of its own from which the entire existing capitalist system will have been excluded, nor with orthodox Liberals, who are so firmly wedded to individualism that they are against repeating the experiment, which failed two years ago, of endeavoring to co-operate with Labor. Mr. Lloyd George, however, makes no secret of his attitude. In his letter disclaiming socialistic leanings, he declares without reserve that, failing a majority of their party in the general elections, the Liberals "should be prepared to co-operate with any party in measures of which we as Liberals approved." Cheers from Labor, not applause from either the Liberal or Conservative benches, punctuate his addresses in the House of Commons. His much advertised land reform scheme, his project for developing the coal industry upon a national scale in combination with electricity, and his suggestions for dealing with the general strike, have all been sympathetic to the viewpoint of Labor.

In two conspicuous instances recently, a departure from the usual custom was marked when leading American colleges in adjoining states conferred honorary degrees in recognition of meritorious public service upon distinguished men whose contributions to the public welfare were not directly connected with academic affairs.

At Ann Arbor, in his home State, Mr. Henry Ford received the honorary degree of Doctor of Engineering. This, it was declared, was "in recognition of his material contributions to social welfare and his constructive imagination in the field of industry." He was cited as one "whose genius brought into being an industry that changed the world."

On the following day, in Ohio, at Oberlin College, the degree of Doctor of Laws was similarly conferred upon Mr. Charles Lathrop Pack, president of the American Tree Association, "for his educational work on the need of reforestation and putting the millions of acres of idle land in this country at work growing trees." Those thus honored are not men of high academic attainments. Neither has to his credit a so-called earned university degree. Yet in attainment and purposeful accomplishment they have both contributed generously in their different lines of activity. Though in a sense being so circumstanced that they were obliged to provide their own equipment, they have proved quite conclusively that achievement is never impossible when the desire to serve is present.

There is no infallible rule or gauge by which one person may accurately measure the success of another. By the same token, it is as difficult fairly or impartially to discover in what measure or for what reason another has failed to achieve success. Some have the vision of initiative, the courage to persevere, where others would give up in despair; the power to plan and execute, where others must forever follow or ignominiously fail. No arbitrary line can be drawn which would separate the successful from the unsuccessful, the captains from the corporals, or the corporals from the privates in the rear ranks. This segregating process has been tried, it is true, but forever from the rear there emerges one who suddenly and unexpectedly displays the qualities of leadership, the power of initiative, the endowments of a general.

Those who have learned how to observe closely and to analyze the processes by which these advances are made have ceased to marvel or to inquire by what right such new leadership is claimed. Excellence and fitness are essential. The standard has not been lowered or otherwise altered. But there has been gained the realization that consecrated and unselfish service, purposeful endeavor, and the willingness to give provide a unique curriculum by which it is possible to make a steady advance.

It would be really interesting to know just what value the graduates from this practical school place upon academic honors thus generously bestowed. One can hardly imagine Mr. Ford adopting for himself the dignified title of "Doctor," or Mr. Pack arrogating to himself any added perfections because of the degree conferred upon him. Yet the distinction is one not to be regarded carelessly. Its chief significance, in the case of both the gentlemen upon whom honor has been bestowed, is in the significance of the action voluntarily taken by the governing boards of colleges of such standing as that achieved by Ann Arbor and Oberlin.

Editorial Notes

More than a mere gift of glass and artistry is the window just presented to Westminster Abbey as a memorial to the British war prisoners by James W. Gerard, formerly United States Ambassador to Berlin. Indeed, it typifies the effort being made in so many quarters to rise above the experiences of the World War and blot out their effects. As Mr. Gerard said in his message read at the dedicatory ceremony: "Let us forget the bitterness of those days, and work together—British, German and American—for a saner, better and more kindly world." Much is written and spoken today concerning world peace, and many means and methods are being advocated whereby it can be brought into universal consciousness. But all these proposals are as sounding brass unless the spirit which Mr. Gerard thus expresses is their foundation stone. The day is surely coming when it will no longer be necessary to ask the question,

When shall all men's good
Be each man's rule, and universal Peace
Lie like a shaft of light across the land,
And like a lane of beams across the sea?

For universal brotherhood will have been recognized as the only safe pathway along which men should travel.

In giving notice in the Canadian House of Commons of a motion providing that before the Canadian Government may "advise ratification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada, or signify acceptance of a treaty or convention, the approval of the Parliament of Canada should be secured," Premier King has taken a step toward opening up a big question. The motion, if carried, will lay down the basic fundamental of parliamentary approval prior to governmental acceptance of a treaty in any way affecting Canada. Since the Treaty of Versailles it has been the practice of the Canadian Government to submit for the approval of the Canadian Parliament only treaties in the negotiation of which Canada has participated. The coming debate in the House will afford opportunity for the Government and Parliament to make their position clear on the main issue. Moreover, while Premier King's motion does not directly raise the question of dominion status, this whole problem is likely to come under review. The motion, in fact, as an outgrowth of the last imperial conference, foreshadows important discussion regarding the powers of the British dominions at the next one to be held in October.

"Commencing" at Oxford

It is nine o'clock in the morning, and in the narrow High and the spacious Broad all sorts and conditions of Oxford men are pouring out from the stately quadrangles and hurrying two and two. They are garbed in the varied gowns which symbolize their academic dignities. For this is convocation day, and the bell of St. Mary's on the stroke of the hour has begun to toll, as it has tolled for centuries, to summon this august community to the Ancient House of Convocation, where students are solemnly invested with the degrees bestowing upon them the right to "commence." That is, to commence to teach what they have learned.

And now, as the hour of ten approaches while the bell still tolls, forth from the gates of the ancient colleges comes the dean in his master's regalia, or if he be a doctor, in scarlet and gray hood, or in the flaming crimson of medicine and law. In the background, college servants with their arms laden with gowns and hoods wait to assist their former masters into their newly attained robes, and so to secure the time-honored reward, which custom demands shall be gold.

Presently the tones of the tolling die away. Across the quadrangle toward the Sheldonian Theater the procession is making its way, headed by the vice-chancellor, the active head of the university, preceded by his staves, the symbols of his authority, and followed by the proctors in velvet sleeves and miniver hoods.

By this time the candidates are seated in the theater and the galleries are crowded with spectators. On the entrance of the vice-chancellor and his train, the assembled body rises and one of the bedells proclaims in Latin, "Enter into the congregation, masters, enter."

Having ascended to his seat of state, the vice-chancellor announces, "Fiat congregatio"; whereupon the registrar makes his declaration that the candidates for degrees have received "grace" (gratiae) from their colleges to present themselves on this occasion. Parts of his formula, such as that the candidates "have kept bed and board continuously within the university for the period required," have remained intact since the Middle Ages. So, likewise, has the next stage of the ceremony, which is the most picturesque and astonishing feature.

If you are an American looking down upon the scene for the first time, you will be amazed and perhaps tempted to laughter at this point, when the candidate is taken by the arm and marched by one of the proctors halfway the length of the "House" and back again.

This "walking" proceeds at such a breakneck pace that the rite seems almost absurdly lacking in dignity. But the form is one of the most significant in the academic ceremonies of the whole world, for the candidate is thus by tradition (as he did once in sober fact) passing in review before the masters of arts, who really constitute the university body and to whom he by this act is "supplicating" for admittance to their number.

It is the visible declaration of the democratic character of the university, for it means that every qualified M. A. possesses the privilege of passing upon every "suppliant" for admittance to the order. Should any master find any candidate unworthy, he must pluck the sleeve of his gown, and by this act alone prevent his "proceeding" to the coveted honor. Though long since obsolete, the formality is a most precious symbol. It is, of course, also, the origin of the academic slang, "pluck" for fail.

When the candidate returns "unplucked" he is then formally presented to the vice-chancellor for his degree. Nowadays all are presented at one time, but until fifty years ago each was presented separately, and then for a time five together, each one holding a finger of his dean. The final act consists of the oath administered by the junior proctor, which each candidate takes upon a copy of the New Testament: "You will swear to observe the statutes, privileges, customs and liberties of your university. Also, when you have been admitted to congregation and to convocation, you behave in them loyally and faithfully to the honor and profit of the university," etc. To this solemn charge the candidates return in response, "Do fidem" (I give my word).

After retiring to receive their newly acquired gowns, the candidates return, with the bedel leading the procession, make their bow to the vice-chancellor, and then leave the House or join the spectators. For them, without further ado, convocation is consummated. To these newly "commenced" masters—it is their ceremony, as distinguished somewhat from formulas applied to doctoral and baccalaureate candidates, which is here described—full privilege is now granted by ancient and original tradition to teach.

No music, no commencement oration, no diplomas tied with gay ribbons, no pronunciation by college presidents that these degrees are granted by gracious authority of (absent) trustees, no conferment of honorary titles upon successful bankers—none of the elaborations of the American college commencement.

Strangely informal, indeed, and rather tediously simple, all this seems to the American, who sees only a vestige of the former ceremonials. But each detail that survives in however abbreviated form is consecrated by the ancient glory of Oxford. And the name which in America has been adopted (and which commencement orators in the United States tell young graduates means the commencement of their real work in life) still preserves the meaning of the twelfth century, when teachers were not hired, but won their admission to the goodly company of scholars by the suffrages of their peers.

The World's Great Capitals: The Week in Rome

The Rome season, which opened in November of last year, has now come to an end, and the Roman aristocratic families and the foreigners residing in Rome are taking their departure for their country houses or for the fashionable summer resorts. In spite of the fact that the court was in mourning for the Queen Mother and that no state visits of foreign sovereigns or heads of state have taken place this year, the season was as brilliant and as crowded with events as any of its predecessors. The great number of international meetings held in the Italian capital during the spring and winter months has attracted a considerable number of illustrious visitors and has been the occasion of celebrations and receptions on a lavish scale which greatly contributed to the success of the season. The closing events, all remarkably successful, have been the international tennis tournament, the international horse show and the visit of the American hotel proprietors and managers. The Italian Crown Prince, who has paid frequent visits to the capital, was the central figure in all the principal receptions, and his popularity among his future subjects is increasing daily.

Nearly one hundred famous manuscripts which formerly belonged to Italian museums or convents, but which had been in the possession of Austria for more than two centuries, have been returned to Italy, in accordance with the stipulations of the peace treaties. Among these manuscripts are the hand-written text of the "Gerusalemme Liberata," by Torquato Tasso (published in 1574), and works of Virgil, Cicero, Lucan, St. Paul, as well as several important documents dealing with salient points of medieval history. Italy is now claiming the restitution of another very important document, which the Italian art experts insist is still secretly and jealously kept by Austria—the so-called Tavole Amalfitane. In the ninth century, Amalfi acquired great importance as a naval power, and shared with Venice and Gaeta the Italian trade with the East. Although its importance had declined in the twelfth century, its maritime code—the Tavole Amalfitane—was recognized in the Mediterranean until the end of the sixteenth century. This code, to which the Italian Consulate of the Sea is now laying claim, consists of seventy-six chapters, twenty-two of which are written in Latin, while the remaining fifty-four are drafted in the Italian language.

While complete silence is maintained on the causes which led Arturo Toscanini to resign from the post of director of the orchestra of the Scala Opera House of Milan, which he kept with such great distinction for the last four years, it is an open secret that his retirement is due to disagreements which Signor Toscanini has had with Fascist leaders in Milan. Signor Toscanini was among the first to join Mussolini in his patriotic movement in 1919, and with Mussolini stood as a candidate for the Fascist Party in the political elections held in the end of that year. Apparently, Signor Toscanini, while endorsing the general policy of the Fascist Government, has disapproved some of its methods, or, to be more precise, some of the actions of the extremist Fascists. The latest friction, and that which led to the resignation of Toscanini, seems to have happened in this way. Pressure from high quarters was brought to force Toscanini to play the Fascist hymn, "Giovinezza," at the beginning of a performance at the Scala. Signor Toscanini refused to do so, on the ground that the Scala was not the proper place for party demonstrations, adding that he would prefer to break up his connection with the theater rather than spoil an artistic performance.

Practically all the members of the Greek royal family may be said to have taken up their residence permanently in Italy. While Queen Sophie spends most of her time between Florence and Rome, Queen Olga, mother of the late King Constantine, has established herself in a beautiful solitary villa on Monte Mario, overlooking Rome. Queen Olga has gently refused the honors which the civic authorities wished to bestow upon her, and she has just filed her application for permission to reside in Rome as an ordinary foreigner. She has brought from Greece all her personal belongings, and spends her days quietly receiving visitors and taking an active interest in several local charitable institutions. A frequent visitor to Queen Olga is Queen Helena of Italy, and no personage of rank who comes to Rome fails to visit her. Even the Greek Foreign Minister, M. Roufos, when he was lately in Rome as the guest of the Italian Government, called to pay his respects to the woman who once sat on the throne of his native country.

The famous archaeological museum of Venice, which was temporarily housed in the Palace of the Doges, has been rearranged for the seventh time, and its treasures of art have been definitely placed in the stately halls of the Royal Palace, where they will soon be shown to the public. This museum was founded by Cardinal Domenico Grimani in the first half of the sixteenth century—the golden age of the Renaissance—when objects of art, whatever their value, were considered worthy of almost religious veneration. The cardinal bequeathed to the Venetian Republic his splendid collection of marbles and bronzes, Greek and Roman sculptures dug from time to time in the soil of the Venetian provinces, and the world-renowned Breviary, illuminated by Flemish artists, which is rightly considered as the most precious of the 13,000 documents preserved in the Marciana Library. Sixty years later the original collection was further enriched by a second donation made by another Grimani, who bequeathed priceless marbles and bronzes, discovered in Greece, Rome and Aquileia. The museum contains the largest number of Greek sculptures in Italy, thirty in all, while the Naples Museum and those of the Capitol and of the Vatican in Rome have less than ten each. Care has been taken to place all the art treasures in chronological order, and to accord all necessary treatment to the various sculptures to insure their greatest value.

The Former German Rulers' Properties

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR: I have read in THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR of the problem confronting the German people in regard to the properties belonging to the former German rulers. One side desires the complete confiscation of them, while the other side opposes such action, without, however, proposing a satisfactory solution.

Now, during the war, the German people were called upon to subscribe to the war loans, a large number of individuals doing so to their utmost. What was the result? With the war over, and the experience of the inflation gained, the German money was stabilized in that all war loans had to be exchanged for new certificates, which, however, amounted to only 5 per cent of the former.

In all the news items published on this subject, it has never been mentioned, so far as I know, that the former rulers have lost any great deal of money through the new order of things.

It does not seem fair that they should lose all they possessed in Germany, but, instead, why should not the approximate value of their holdings be ascertained and 5 per cent of the total be issued to them in the bonds previously mentioned? In this wise the ex-rulers would feel the burden of the people, while no immediate drain upon the Treasury of the Reich would be necessitated.

There may be other solutions, but at any rate the people deserve first consideration. Every effort should be made to deal fairly and with good will. C. K. Weehawken, N. J.

The Meaning of Sinn Féin

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR: In one of the very appreciative articles on Ireland as an attractive resort for tourists, appearing in the MONITOR recently, allow me to point out that an incorrect translation is given of the Gaelic words, Sinn Féin, which conveys an altogether false impression of the movement called by that name—i. e., a selfish impression.

The thought in the mind of Arthur Griffith when founding the Sinn Féin movement was the necessity for each one to do his or her own work. I, mé féin, as an individual, must not look to another to do my work for me. Neither should we, Sinn Féin, the people of Ireland, look to any other country to do our work for us. "Alone" (in Gaelic "amháin") does not come into it at all.

If you will kindly publish this letter, you will correct a mistranslation which has frequently appeared in the public press. Most of the discord in the world comes from misunderstanding—the result of ignorance. C. T. Ireland.

[Sinn Féin is defined in the Concise Oxford Dictionary as "A twentieth century patriotic movement and party in Ireland aiming at national revival in language, etc., as well as at home rule. (Ir.—ourselves alone)."—Ed.]

"Closed Streets for Play"

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR: This is to express the appreciation of the Playground and Recreation Association of America for the excellent article, "Closed Streets for Play," which appeared recently in the MONITOR. The constant interest of the MONITOR in giving publicity to community recreation news is very gratifying to friends of the recreation movement.
